PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SEVENTIETH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION

SENATE

MONDAY, January 28, 1929

Rev. James W. Morris, D. D., assistant rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

O God, our Father, Thou alone hast immortality; for Thou alone art from everlasting to everlasting. Thou alone hast neither beginning of days nor end of life. And Thou only art wise. To Thee alone belong the secrets of eternal time, from inscrutible beginnings to mysterious end. Thou, too, art the blessed and only Potentate, King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, in whose hand our breath is and whose are all our ways.

Eternal, All-Wise, Almighty God, graciously hear the prayers of the frail creatures of Thy hand. Impress us not only with life's uncertainties but also with its swift and solemn certainties. Save us from futilities that darken our brief day. Challenge us with high duties that once and once only are ours. Grant us to test the things for which we strive and the forces that rule our life by our high calling in Christ Jesus.

Give us grace so to serve Thee in our generation that at last we may be gathered to our fathers, having the testimony of a good conscience, in the communion of Thy holy church, in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable, religious, and holy hope in favor with Thee our God, and in perfect charity with the world. For the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3453) to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of Clara Percy, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11854) for the relief of John W. Leich, alias John Leach, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate just a moment. During the debate on the peace treaty a colloquy took place in the Senate with reference to the Spanish-American War. It came up purely in the way of illustration and as an incident of the debate. Some erroneous impressions seem to have been drawn by the Spanish people and the Spanish Government from that debate.

I think I can speak for all those who took part in the colloquy to the effect that there was no intention of reviving the question of the responsibility for the destruction of the Maine, nor in any wise assessing or reassessing or imputing any responsibility to the Spanish people or the Spanish Government. A careful reading of the debate, I believe, will disclose that fact.

I desire to say further that I am sure I express the views of the American people and of the American Government when I say that it is our desire to live upon terms of cordial friendship with the Spanish Government and the Spanish people, and, furthermore, that we entertain for them the highest respect and the most sincere good feeling.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I very cordially reaffirm what has been said by the Senator from Idaho? The query which probably has given rise to the unfortunate situation was in fact one which was propounded by me, during the course of the debate upon the multilateral peace treaty, to the Senator from Idaho, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. The propounding of the query was in an academic sense entirely and because in reading the multilateral treaty some curiosity had been aroused in my mind as to events that had transpired in the past and what effect the treaty might have had upon those events.

It seemed to me that the treaty, if it had been in force at the time of the Spanish-American War, would have precluded such a war on our part. Solely because that was the opinion I held, I asked the question of the Senator from Idaho whether in his opinion that was the case? That was all there was to the incident. Behind it there was no thought in my mind, none in his, none in the minds of those who participated in the discussion, other than a mere construction of what the treaty might have done in days gone by.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, praying for the immediate passage of legislation to protect the southwest section of the country from the foot-and-mouth disease, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See joint memorial printed in full when presented to-day by Mr. ASHURST.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, indorsing and approving the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented to-day by Mr. WATSON.)

Mr. OVERMAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Tryon, N. C., praying for the continuance of the present immigration law with the national origins quota provision contained therein to become operative on July 1, 1929, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. ASHURST presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
NINTH STATE LEGISLATURE, REGULAR SESSION.

House Joint Memorial 1

Whereas there exists within the State of California at the present time an epidemic of that highly infectious disease, affecting man and all cloven-hoof animals, known as the foot-and-mouth disease; and

Whereas it has been reported by reliable authority that the present as well as similar outbreaks of the past have been introduced into the United States by the importation of garbage from foreign countries, specific instances being as follows:

(1) During the month of February, 1924, introduced at Vallejo, Calif., by garbage from a United States naval transport.

(2) During the month of September, 1925, introduced into a Texas seaport by garbage from a tramp steamship.

(3) During the month of January, 1929, introduced into the port of San Pedro, Calif., by garbage from a United States naval transport: And, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Ninth State Legislature of the State of Arizona (the State Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized, petitioning that immediate and adequate legislation be enacted by said Congress to protect this section of the country from the present recurrence and future recurrence of this dread infection; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial, suitably engrossed, be transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior, the Speaker of the House of Representatives in Congress, and to each of the Representatives in Congress from the State of Arizona.

Mr. WATSON presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, which was ordered to lie on the table:

And I hereby further certify, that the herein exemplification is in due form and made by me as the proper officer, and is entitled to have full faith and credit given it in every court and office within the United States.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State of Indiana, at the city of Indianapolis, this 23d day of January, A. D. 1929.

FERTILIZER AT MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and printed in the RECORD a statement by W. F. McFarland, of Florence, Ala., concerning nitrogen as a fertilizer and the failure of the farmer to derive benefit from the plant at Hopewell, Va.

There being no objection, the statement was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

W. F. MCFARLAND COAL CO.,
Florence, Ala., January 26, 1929.

Senator HUGO BLACK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: You will remember that in the debates on Muscle Shoals legislation during the last session of Congress the statement was made many times that the synthetic process for the fixation of air nitrogen was much cheaper and more practical than the cyanamid process, and that the farmers would get an abundance of cheap nitrogen as soon as the synthetic-ammonia manufacturers entered the fertilizer field.

The synthetic-ammonia plant at Hopewell, Va., is now offering their product to the fertilizer mixers. We have not been able to get the price of ammonia f. o. b. Hopewell, but the cost delivered to the International Agricultural Corporation, a fertilizer mixer at Florence, Ala., is $3.07 per unit. The unit in fertilizer parlance is 1 per cent of the short ton, or 20 pounds of pure plant food.

The price per pound of ammonia is, therefore, $0.1535. Expressed in nitrogen: 20 pounds of ammonia equals 16.5 pounds of nitrogen. Therefore, $0.1535 for ammonia equals $0.186 for nitrogen.

The cash retail price of Chilean nitrate quoted by the International Agricultural Corporation at Florence is on the basis of $0.20256 per pound of nitrogen. This company has not quoted the retail unit price of synthetic ammonia, but it is safe to assume that at least a margin of $0.01656 per pound will be added to their cost, making the retail price to the farmer the same as Chilean nitrate.

I would suggest that the above information, after being verified by Doctor Cottrell, of the Nitrogen Research Laboratory at Washington, could be used effectively in furthering the Muscle Shoals cause.

Doctor Cottrell, testifying before the House Military Affairs Committee at various times during the long Muscle Shoals hearings, indicated that the farmer would get relief from high nitrogen prices when the synthetic-ammonia people entered the fertilizer field.

It now looks as if the operation of the Muscle Shoals plant is the only hope of the farmer for cheaper fertilizer.

It has been repeatedly said that this plant is obsolete, but it appears to me that the most obsolete feature of the fertilizer business is the American method of obtaining nitrogen for our farmers.

According to the United States Commerce Department report for 1927, the power required per ton of nitrogen by German manufacturers, using the cyanamid process, is 9,090 kilowatt-hours. At 2 mills per kilowatt-hour, this amount of power would cost $18.80, or 0.0094 mill per pound of nitrogen. At this rate the power cost to manufacture the 310 pounds of nitrogen contained in a ton of Chilean nitrate, costing the farmer $62.79, would be only $2.91.

DRAFTING OF NATIONAL RESOURCES IN WAR TIMES

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the members of the Senate have heard for several years much discussion of the proposal to draft all of the resources and man power of the Nation in case of war. The American Legion has taken a leading part in urging the adoption of some such proposal. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] in the last Congress introduced a bill providing for such action in case of war. The problem involves so many angles, and is capable of so much mistaken action if we should act in haste, that it seems to me wise to consider it deliberately in peace time rather than hurriedly in the next emergency. I therefore take great pleasure in submitting now, at the request of the American Legion, a joint resolution providing for the appointment of a commission to consider and recommend legislation along that line, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read by title.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 204) to promote peace and to equalize the burdens and to minimize the profits of war was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO NICARAGUAN CANAL RESOLUTION

Mr. HAWES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal, which was, on page 4, in line 19, after the words "Chief of Engineers," to insert "and such civilian engineers as the President deems advisable."

The amendment was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 11854) for the relief of John W. Leich, alias John Leach, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PROPOSED CONSIDERATION OF BRIDGE BILLS

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there are a number of bridge bills on the calendar which have recently been reported. Some of them are Senate bills, and it is quite important to have them sent over to the House of Representatives. They are all formal bills, they are all framed according to the regular form, and have been reported on favorably by the Commerce Committee. I ask unanimous consent that we may consider those bridge bills and let them be sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. JONES. Has morning business been closed, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business has not been closed. Concurrent and other resolutions are now in order. Morning business is about to be closed.

CERTAIN UNITED STATES PROPERTY AT NEW YORK CITY

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I submit the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask that it may be adopted. The resolution proposes the recall of a bill from the President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) entitled "Joint resolution granting the consent of Congress to the city of New York to enter upon certain United States property for the purpose of constructing a rapid transit railway."

Mr. WAGNER. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

AWARD OF GOLD MEDALS—AMENDMENT OF TITLE

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, on Saturday the Senate agreed to amendments to a Senate bill which had been acted on by the House, but through inadvertance the title of the bill was not amended. I am presenting at this time and ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a concurrent resolution directing that the title of the bill be amended so as to be correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 33) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (S. 4338) entitled "An act to authorize the President to award, in the name of Congress, gold medals of appropriate design to Albert C. Read, Elmer F. Stone, Walter Hinton, H. C. Rodd, J. L. Breese, and Eugene Rhodes," the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized to amend the title thereof, so as to read: "An act to authorize the President to award, in the name of Congress, gold medals of appropriate design to John H. Towers, Albert C. Read, Elmer F. Stone, Walter Hinton, H. C. Rodd, J. L. Breese, and Eugene Rhodes."

INVESTIGATION OF ELECTION OF SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA, 1926

Mr. SHORTRIDGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 310), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 68, agreed to on December 17, 1927, authorizing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate the election of a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania in 1926, hereby is continued in full force and effect until the end of the first regular session of the Seventy-first Congress.

INVESTIGATION OF APPOINTMENTS OF POSTMASTERS IN PRESIDENTIAL OFFICES

Mr. MOSES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 311), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 193, agreed to on May 3, 1928, authorizing the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to investigate the choice of postmasters in presidential offices, hereby is continued in full force and effect until the end of the first regular session of the Seventy-first Congress.

POINTS OF HISTORIC INTEREST IN THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

Mr. MOSES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 312), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the pamphlet, Points of Historic Interest in the National Capital, with accompanying illustrations, be printed as a Senate document, and that 10,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

FEDERAL FARM LOAN SYSTEM

Mr. BLEASE. I submit a resolution which I ask may be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and that the accompanying matter be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution (S. Res. 313) was referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as follows:

BANKING AND CURRENCY

Whereas it appears that certain members of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau of the Treasury Department and officers of certain district Federal land and intermediate credit banks, comprising what is known as a branch of the Federal farm loan system, established by act of Congress in 1916, and as amended, in the present dilemma to fortify the said banks against the financial losses resulting from foreclosure of farm mortgages and the mismanagement of the affairs of said banks, did recently cause to be issued, or did issue, orders to the national farm loan associations, which now own the capitalization of the said district Federal land banks, which would amend the Federal farm loan act, and provides that such associations and farmer owners would assume liabilities in excess of the 10 per cent limit of individual farm loans established by act of Congress; and

Whereas Congress did establish said 10 per cent maximum limit only after most exhaustive investigation and hearings on the part of its committees, fullest discussion on the floor of the House of Representatives and of the Senate, prior to the passage of said act; and

Whereas it is contrary to legal or orderly procedure for any bureau or board, established by act of Congress for the purpose of supervising or administration of the affairs of any branch of the Federal Government, to thus assume to usurp the legislative prerogatives of Congress by increasing the percentage of liability any farmer borrower shall be obliged to pay in the settlement of losses of any Federal land bank; and

Whereas the increased liability limit constitutes extortionate usury in the form of overcharges against said farmer-borrowers and national farm loan associations; and

Whereas the Federal farm loan act was enacted for the purpose of relieving and not burdening the American farmer with debt and excessive charges and commissions; and

Whereas it appears that the members of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau, as individuals and working through their appointees in the Federal land banks, did resort to unfair and unjust methods and practices in securing the indorsement of the proposed agreement to increase the liability limit; and

Whereas it appears that partisan political pressure has been brought to bear upon certain national farm loan association representatives, who have been threatened by said members of the bureau or their appointees in the event of their failure to comply with the illegal proposal; and

Whereas the very fact that the members of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau now resort to this illegal contravention of an act of Congress to bolster up the tottering financial condition existing in certain district Federal and intermediate credit banks constitutes confession of the deplorable financial condition of certain banks; and

Whereas the interests of American bondholders of securities issued under the supervision of the said Federal Farm Loan Bureau, on the part of the district Federal and intermediate-credit banks, in excess of $1,500,000,000 is now in open jeopardy by reason of the critical financial condition of such banks, and the faith and confidence of the American investor may be impaired if remedies are not quickly brought to the rescue; and

Whereas both the interest of American agriculture and of the investing public are now at stake; and

Whereas thousands of farmers would be overburdened by payment of excessive liabilities to said banks under the illegal proposed plan, and other thousands deprived of membership and service by reason of not wishing to affiliate with banks so near bankruptcy as to require excessive liability assumption on the part of stockholding members; and

Whereas it appears that for several years an alleged fiscal agency, or agent, has operated under the official sanction of the said bureau, in behalf of certain Federal and intermediate credit banks, the aggregate contributions from the funds of said banks having totaled in excess of $500,000, said money representing funds which belonged to the farmer-owners and should have been distributed to them as dividends or profits; and

Whereas it appears that much of this money was employed in publicity or propaganda purposes, some of which was used to secure legislative amendments to the farm loan act in keeping with the viewpoint of said members of the bureau and land-bank staffs, contrary to the wishes of the farmer owners; and

Whereas neither the Federal Farm Loan Bureau of the Treasury nor the fiscal agency or agent has transmitted either to the farmer-owners of the land banks or to Congress a financial statement of the condition of the banks or the agency under their supervision comparable to that issued freely by both National and State banking institutions; and

Whereas the consolidated resources of the Federal land and intermediate credit banks is money which justly belongs to the thousands of farmers who have jointly contributed to the treasuries of said banks, and is not the property of any supervising dictator or appointee; and

Whereas it now appears that in excess of $80,000,000 such undivided profits have accrued in the treasuries of said banks, which should be used to reduce interest rates which farmer borrowers are obliged to pay on their farm loans; and

Whereas the financial condition of several of the Federal land and intermediate credit banks is acknowledged to be critical by members of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau and the bank officers, who have resorted to an illegal and extortionate method to repay losses; and

Whereas the subject of just and economical financing of American agriculture now constitutes one of the outstanding problems of the hour, the proper solving of which may free millions of farmers from the excessive extortion which has prevailed, and permit thousands to participate of the financial service intended in the Federal farm loan act: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a committee to investigate fully into the affairs of the said Federal Farm Loan Bureau of the Treasury Department, of financial condition and administrative methods involved in operation of the 12 district Federal land banks and 12 district intermediate credit banks, constituting branches of the Federal farm loan system, said committee to consist of two members each of the majority and minority parties represented in the membership of the Senate, namely, two Republican and two Democratic Members, said committee to carry on an exhaustive and thorough nation-wide investigation concerning:

(a) Procedure employed by members of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau and of their appointees, members of the staffs of the said Federal land and intermediate credit banks, in securing indorsement of the agreement to increase the liability to be assumed by national farm loan associations and farmer-borrower stockholding owners of said banks, in excess of that legal maximum established in the farm loan act;

(b) The percentage of extortionate usury which would be exacted of the said associations and farmer owners as result of such excessive liability limit;

(c) Whether undue or unjust methods were employed to secure such indorsement of said associations, their officers, or farmer owners, and if political pressure or partisanship is and/or has been employed in supervision and administration of said banks, either by members of Federal Farm Loan Bureau or their appointees, officers of said banks, in relation with affairs of the said associations and loan business of farmer owners;

(d) If interest of farmer-owners and of the bondholders of Federal land and intermediate credit banks are in jeopardy, requiring special remedial measures or financial assistance;

(e) Actual financial condition of the Federal land and intermediate credit banks, and intelligent financial statement of the financial subjects under control of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau, and of the transactions, since inception, of the so-called fiscal agency, or agent, that will permit the farmer-owner and public to understand clearly the real status of the system;

(f) Relief that will insure to farmer-owners not assuming in excess of their proportionate legal liability of the losses involved in failure of certain banks to pay profit, either as result of mismanagement or foreclosure of farm-mortgage loans;

(g) Whether money or moneys of fiscal agency or agent have been devoted to publicity or propaganda purposes, and who handled and received same, and for what specific purpose or purposes;

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In your investigation of the Columbia Land Bank would you please investigate the loan made to John Sheffield, of this place? He has been dead four years and his family have been required to pay rent and also keep up the payment to the land bank. I would be glad if you would find out what became of the cotton we paid for rent. Did the land bank get it? If so, what did they do with it? And I would like to know what became of John Sheffield's stock in the land bank, and why it does not pay any dividend. I think that the local attorney for the land bank is working on both sides, as he has accepted a fee from the heirs of John Sheffield, which I have been advised is unlawful. Please get Ben Tillman's pitchfork after these fellows. Any information you wish I will gladly give, as I and my mother have been unable to find what use the rent cotton was put to.

We shall look for you to investigate this matter, for we know that what you do will be well done.

Yours,

JOHN SHEFFIELD, Jr.

P. S.: You may make any use of this letter you please, for the facts stated can be supported by written evidence, bill, and receipt.

REEVESVILLE, S. C., January 26, 1929.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I know that you are well informed as to the depressed agricultural conditions in South Carolina. You know the coastal section was visited last year by a tropical storm which took very heavy toll from the farmers. I do not know the exact percentage of farmers whose farms are mortgaged in our State, but I do know that it runs very high—80 to 85 per cent, I think.

These mortgages are largely owned by the joint-stock land bank, Federal land bank, and large insurance companies. A great many of them in our section have already been taken over by the mortgagees, and unless our products bring a more remunerative price than they have in the past several years the Federal land bank and the joint-stock land bank will own the balance of them, unless there is some outside help. Is it possible to stay this interest from five to eight years and give the farmers time to get back on their feet? You know we were all caught by the gradual inflation and sudden deflation by the Government, and it is next to impossible to pay an inflated debt with a deflated dollar.

You extended the foreign debt for 30 years without interest and 30 years more at a very low rate of interest—3 per cent, I think—while we, a part of your own Government, are paying 6½ to 7 per cent, and if we miss our payment we are closed out and put in the woods. It looks to me that we, a part of your own Government, should have some consideration along this line.

I know you are very busy and I am sorry to trouble you with these matters, but they are of a serious nature, and I would like to have your valuable cooperation. As you know, I have a very high regard for your opinion in all business matters, governmental and otherwise.

With kind regards I am,

Yours very sincerely,

A. R. JOHNSTON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 28, 1929.

Dr. A. R. JOHNSTON,
Reevesville, S. C.

MY DEAR DOCTOR: Yours of January 26 received.

I thank you for the same. However, I am thoroughly familiar with the conditions mentioned therein and I have been trying for months to get relief for our farmers, as you will notice by reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and even this morning, before I received your letter, I was preparing an additional statement to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-day.

I am inclosing copy of resolution introduced by me December 14, 1928. I am going to keep up the fight, but whether I can get any assistance or not, even from southern Senators, is very doubtful, as so far I have been unable to do so; not one has lifted his voice to help me in the matter. I shall insert your letter along with others which I have in to-morrow's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and mail you a copy.

I notice in your letter you say, "You extended the foreign debt, etc." I beg to say that you are very much mistaken. You should have said "Congress," for if I had had my way every dollar of foreign indebtedness would have been collected dollar for dollar with full rate of interest.

I thank you very much for your kind personal reference to myself, and with my kindest regards and very best wishes, I am

As ever,

COLE L. BLEASE.

S. J. Res. 178, Seventieth Congress, second session

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

December 13 (calendar day, December 14), 1928

Mr. BLEASE introduced the following joint resolution, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 178) to instruct officials of the Federal Farm Loan Board and subsidiaries not to foreclose any mortgage on real estate which is or will become due and payable prior to October 1, 1929

Resolved, etc., That the officials of the Federal Farm Loan Board and all subsidiaries thereof be, and are hereby, directed to advise and instruct all of the officials of all banks under their control not to foreclose any lien or mortgage held by them upon any real estate which is or will become due and payable prior to October 1, 1929.

FARMERS' PRODUCE EXCHANGE,
GENERAL OFFICE,
Beaufort, S. C., January 19, 1929.

Senator COLE L. BLEASE,
Washington, D. C.

Re: Federal intermediate credit bank, Columbia, S. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I would like very much for you to take up the matter of the Federal loan bank and ascertain from them as to how legitimate, honest working farmers in our section can compete with operation of farms by the Federal intermediate bank, Columbia, S. C.

It appears to us in this community very unjust competition, and would like very much to know if this is the general practice of all Federal intermediate banks operated by the Government.

Anything you can do for us in remedying the conditions that we are confronted with under the present times will be greatly appreciated.

I am,

Yours very truly, R. V. BRAY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 21, 1929.

Mr. R. V. BRAY,

Farmers' Produce Exchange, Beaufort, S. C.

DEAR MR. BRAY: Senator BLEASE has your letter of January 19 relative to the Federal Land and Intermediate Credit Bank of Columbia, S. C.

The Senator is not fully clear as to your statement or question, "How legitimate, honest, working farmers in our section can compete with operation of farms by the Federal intermediate credit bank, Columbia, S. C."

Do you mean that the intermediate credit bank or that the land bank is actually operating or leasing or renting out farms in your section? If so, the Senator will appreciate your kindness very much in furnishing him with affidavits to this effect, as the information would be valuable and important in his fight.

With assurances of the Senator's esteem and good wishes, I am

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

FARMERS' PRODUCE EXCHANGE,
GENERAL OFFICE,
Beaufort, S. C., January 26, 1929.

Senator COLE L. BLEASE,
Washington, D. C.

In re: Letter John D. Long, secretary, January 21, 1929.

MY DEAR SENATOR: With further reference to the above and my letter of the 19th, Federal intermediate credit bank activities in this section.

In the last paragraph of Mr. Long's letter he suggested that I furnish you with sworn affidavits in reference to the above.

It is matter of record at the courthouse in this county that the Federal Intermediate Bank of Columbia has foreclosed, more than two years ago, on the property of one James R. Bellamy. It is also a matter of record that Mr. Bellamy does not own one cent's worth of property, but in spite of this, in 1928, he operated to full capacity a farm of more than 200 acres, the said acreage the property of the Federal intermediate bank, formerly Bellamy's, and every penny to cover these operations was furnished by the said intermediate bank and without any security whatsoever.

Likewise, this year 1929, he is carrying on the same operations in the same manner, being furnished from the same source, and using the same lands as heretofore.

In addition to this, it is also a matter of record that the farm of one E. B. Mitchell, of Lobeco, S. C., 12 miles north of Beaufort, was also taken over by the Federal intermediate bank, said farm being one of the best in the county and containing some 600 or more acres now.

Mr. Bellamy informed the writer some weeks ago that he had been instructed by the Intermediate Bank of Columbia to take charge of and operate this last-mentioned farm of E. B. Mitchell's under the same condition as he has operated the other bank farm, and the writer knows from his own observation that these lands have been plowed and is now ready for seed. Just what acreage is going to be planted on this farm the writer would not like to state, but in the next three weeks I can furnish you with facts as to acreage actually planted on the last-mentioned farm and affidavits, too, if necessary.

Now, Senator, we farmers of this section do not feel we are receiving a square deal from our Government when they go into the trucking industry in competition to us, especially inasmuch as they advise against overproduction, and we appeal to you for relief.

Feeling that any assistance you can render us will be gladly and willingly given, want to thank you in advance.

I ask that unless it becomes necessary that you withhold my name, but at the same time please understand should you have to use my name, then do so.

Cordially yours,

R. V. BRAY.

RAISING ILLEGAL LIABILITY LIMIT MEANS EXTORTIONATE PRACTICES

As you may well know by this date, there has been going on throughout the country a united effort on the part of members of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau, working through their appointees, the officers and directors of the district Federal land banks, a campaign to secure the indorsement on the part of the local national farm loan associations of an increased liability limit above that provided in the act by Congress. If this method is effected, it means that hundreds of millions of dollars will be saddled onto the farmers as individuals or as members of these associations instead of being spread, as the law clearly provides, throughout the 12 banks.

FARM FINANCE THREATENED WITH USURY

Since Congress established an upper limit at which money may be loaned, as well as the maximum limit of liability which any farmer borrower would assume, namely, 10 per cent of his loan, it is very evident that it was the intent to avert the very hardship which the Farm Loan Board now imposes in carrying on this secret campaign.

Their purpose is plain. It is well known in financial circles, particularly in the ranks of the staffs of the land banks and associations, that a great crisis, which borders closely on a national scandal, now lurks behind the scene, as it has for many months past. Two or three of the Federal land banks are so near bankruptcy and failure that it is delicate to even mention this fact in certain circles; this is a fact in spite of the paid propaganda which certain members of the Farm Loan Board have either themselves issued or had lackies on Washington newspapers print for them. If this were not the instance, why should they secretly endeavor to secure indorsement by any association of farmers to an increased liability limit than provided by law, which is illegal and usurious and far in excess of that provided by Congress? If they have nothing to fear, why is it that they seek the dark corners and work in dank cellars instead of getting up and out into God's sunshine? Why is it that such men as Farm Loan Commissioner Eugene Meyer gives out to newspaper men statements that he has "cleaned up" the system "quietly," when he well knows that at the same time his appointees are rushing up and down the land endeavoring to frighten and browbeat local farm organizations into accepting a plan which the farmers well know is not to their interest and which, if imposed, will work a real hardship upon the farmer and the agricultural industry as a whole? Why these and other conditions which everyone conversant with the system knows to exist?

LEGALIZED HIGHWAY ROBBERY WOULD FOLLOW

Prior to either the House or the Senate enacting the Federal farm loan act, in 1916, it is well and generally known that exhaustive investigations were carried on both abroad and at home. Scarcely a sentence was permitted to enter that original act without hours, nay, weeks, of thoughtful consideration. No parts received greater attention than those divisions which have to do with safeguarding the interests of the farmer and farming industry the Congress sought to serve in this manner; no part of the act was so thoroughly discussed pro and con as the rate of interest to be charged, the amortization limits, and the liability limits which borrowers would receive and assume. The section which alludes to this legalized limit of liability is the crux of the whole act; upon this the Federal farm loan system rests, whether a chariot of destruction or an army of service.

Just as each individual farmer is legally forced to assume and pay for shares of stock in the system to the extent of 5 per cent of the amount of his loan, or $50 per $1,000 borrowed, so likewise, to safeguard the system, he is, under the same process of an act of Congress, forced to assume a liability equal to not exceed 10 per cent, or $100 per $1,000 borrowed.

It would be exactly as reasonable for the members of the Federal Farm Loan Board to now pretend to secure indorsement of the banks and the associations to a proposed plan to force every new borrower to purchase $100, instead of $50, per $1,000 as capital stock, as it is now for them through some foxy manner to secure an amended agreement for the farmer to assume a greater liability than imposed under the sections of the farm loan act. If they continue to carry on in the same manner they have in the past, they have ample brass and audacity to endeavor to do this, but they have not as yet enforced their illegal impositions as regards liabilities.

ILLEGAL PROPOSED AGREEMENT

As is well known, in recent months, certain Federal land-bank officers have transmitted through the United States mails, addressed to officers of national farm-loan associations, a proposed amendment for the organization to consider and adopt, which would increase the liability assumed far above the legal 10 per cent limit. With this plan I neither concur nor shall become party to; it would constitute legalized highway robbery of the rankest type, while parading as a servant and helpmate of farmers.

As you probably realize, until quite recently, as per the provisions of the farm loan act, losses incurred by Federal land banks, whether as the result of mismanagement on the part of their directors and officers, or giant contributions to fiscal agencies, or contributions to sustain and feed the members of the Farm Loan Bureau, or as the result of foreclosure of farm mortgages—all this was and should be paid from the proceeds of the bank, associations to bear equal proportionate share.

UNFAIR ASSESSMENT OF LIABILITIES

However, if the proposal of the Farm Loan Board and of the various Federal land bank officers were effected, as the politicians hope and pray, this burden would be unjustly and unequally vested upon certain parties not intended to come within the scope of the act.

For example, there are two Western States. For many months past all the farmers of the land bank district have been obliged, under the legal workings of the farm loan act, to contribute excessive sums, either directly or in the form of reduced participation dividends in the earnings of the land bank, as the result of one farming State's agricultural industry being on the rocks. There was no serious complaint of doing this obviously legal liability assuming on the part of anyone. There were strong and urgent complaints that the officers of the land bank—hand picked by the Farm Loan Board—did not do everything they might to relieve the situation and did not exercise the best business judgment in face of a crisis. But no one complained of paying the bill of their mismanagement. We simply charged that off as part of belonging to the system.

The land bank, not the farm loan associations of that State, was held financially responsible for the losses incurred in that State. Had those associations paid their own bills out of their own tills, they would have been defunct long since. But we all helped them to pay, assuming our liability on the legal basis of 10 per cent of the amount of our loans.

Now, times are very poor in our own district. Our farmers now feel the bite in the rope of financial shortage and crop failure. The jest is that the State we helped out is not as yet on its feet and can not help us in our hour of need. Not only must we carry our own load, but theirs as well. But that is contemplated and provided for in the farm loan act under the mutual measure which makes farmer borrowers brothers, bearing each other's burdens.

In face of the fact that Congress established the utmost upper limit of liability which any farmer borrower could assume, officers of the land bank recently prepared and submitted to the associations a plan which calls for the local associations and farmer borrowers assuming liabilities far in excess of that 10 per cent legal limit. Invoked, it would constitute wholesale usury. However, this is the plan the land bank asks us to sign, and I understand that the Farm Loan Board is not content with it and that they will submit still another which would work even more real hardship upon the farmers.

WHOLESALE FORECLOSURES

Last May I read with great interest the subject matter placed in the RECORD from Mr. Putnam, of Harmonsburg, Pa., with reference to foreclosure methods resorted to in certain land-bank districts, and his mention of the wholesale campaign of taking farms away from farmers.

Well, we have more than 300 such farms in this district now, which represent a liability against each of the associations. Deficiency judgments now entered against the associations by the land bank aggregate about $20,000. This is an average of nearly $600 per judgment. If spread out over the more than 300 farms, it represents about $52 per farm. The farms taken over represent a total valuation of approximately $1,500,000, or average about $5,800 each. As we have seen, under the legal status of the farm loan act, as provided in the act of Congress, the sum that each of the associations would be required to assume to remit these losses would not exceed about $52.

Now, let us consider, contrasted with this legal plan, the illegal and usurious plan suggested by the Farm Loan Board and the officials of the Federal land bank.

Slightly more than one-third of the 300 farms have been sold on the auction block to date. The disposal of same represented a total loss to the land bank and to the associations of more than $65,000, or an average loss of about $640 per farm foreclosed upon. If we work under the legal plan of assuming our share of the losses on the basis of not to exceed 10 per cent of the loans, which Congress provided, and these are equalized over the land bank district, it means that we would assume only $52 as the upper limit of the loss, but if we adopt the plan suggested by the land bank and Farm Loan Board we would assume losses aggregating $640. What that five hundred and ninety-odd dollars would mean if kept in the pockets of the farmer few can realize unless they are on intimate terms with the farmer and his family. It means the difference between an education for the boys and girls, clothes for father and mother and children, a living instead of an existence for the entire family.

However, our land bank officials still have some 200 farms to dispose of. How great the mounting losses will become, no prophet would be bold enough to proclaim; but it will be large enough to demonstrate their administration as a flat failure. It should be noted that the president of this bank holds his position only because of political pull, against the wishes of the farmers and associations, and is forced down our throats by the present Farm Loan Board. He is recognized as unfit for any position in the bank, and has been accused and never denied, dishonest acts on many occasions. In fact, he kept on the payroll of the bank officers who had confessed to illegal manipulations, long after they had confessed—this long after the farmer-elected directors had protested.

MISSTATEMENTS AND TWISTED PRESENTATION

Certain officers of the joint-stock land banking system have been prosecuted and given prison sentences for using the United States mails in an improper and fraudulent manner. It should be noted that this was done at the instance of the members of the Farm Loan Board. Whether justice was meted out or not, I can not say.

However, I do not think officers of the land bank have misused the same mails in transmitting to associations a fabrication of misstatements relative to this proposed amended liability agreement. In view of the fact that it would aggregate a considerable sum of money, whether we were to consider it from the standpoint of individual associations, or from a nation-wide standpoint, it therefore seems, constitutes fraudulent use of the mails. A monetary value would be secured with which land bank and Farm Loan Board members would be able to cover up the large losses resulting as a direct aftermath of their mismanagement.

Not only did land-bank officials use the mail to transmit untruths, but their traveling representatives did so in addresses. For example, one of their lawyers, questioned before a conference of association officials, as to the association, would be liable for the full amount of foreclosed loans, replied they would not. Experienced title attorneys present, who has investigated the matter, quickly replied that the attorney of the bank had stated an untrue reply, and that the association, by signing the proposed agreement, would not be released, but be held tightly to suffer excessive share of the losses resulting. This is only one of several examples that might be stated to reveal the double-dealing methods resorted to in the present campaign to "save the faces" of the political manipulators of the loan system.

Below I hand you a copy of the proposed agreement sent to our association by the officials of the Federal land bank, which I am advised is quite similar to that transmitted through the mails to associations in other parts of the country, in the nation-wide campaign of the Farm Loan Board:

(The usual legal paragraphs head the agreement, which then continues:)

Witnesseth:

That whereas, under the provisions of section 25 of the Federal farm loan act as amended, said association is liable for the payment in cash or by the substitution of an equal amount of Federal farm-loan bonds of any unpaid balance on any defaulted loan indorsed by said association and held by said bank under the provisions of said act; and

Whereas the amount of this liability has heretofore been determined at the time of the sale of property on foreclosure by crediting the sum for which the property sells at foreclosure sale on the judgment, the unpaid balance of the judgment, if any, being entered by the clerk of the court as a deficiency judgment against the associations; and

Whereas experience has shown that property at foreclosure sale seldom brings the amount for which it might be sold if the sale were not forced, and for that reason the sum entered as a deficiency judgment against the association does not truly represent the loss to the bank; and

Whereas the true measure of the loss to the bank in cases where the bank acquires the property is ascertained at the time of the sale of the property by the bank after foreclosure; and

Whereas the docketing of the deficiency judgment against the association is a source of embarrassment to the association and an impediment to the business of said association in procuring applications for loans to be made by said bank, because prospective applicants are unwilling to assume a stockholder's liability incident to membership in said association when there are unsatisfied judgments of record against the association:

Now, therefore, it is agreed by and between the parties hereto that it shall not be necessary to join the association as a defendant in the foreclosure of any loan indorsed by it in order to fix its liability but that until such time as the bank disposes of the property, whereupon the association shall be credited with the sum for which the property is sold, and the association shall be liable to the bank for any unpaid balance.

ILLEGAL LIABILITY LIMIT IS ESTABLISHED

It is further agreed that where the bank takes title by deed in order to avoid foreclosure, either directly to the bank or by deed to the association, that the association shall remain liable as indorser for the full amount of the loan until such time as the bank disposes of the property, whereupon the association shall be credited with the sum for which the property is sold and the association shall be liable to the bank for the unpaid balance.

The association agrees that where any property subject to mortgage has been conveyed to the association that the association will, upon request from the bank, convey it to the bank.

THE ASSOCIATION HOLDS ALL OF THE BAG

The association agrees that the extension of time of any borrower or borrowers upon obligations which are indorsed by the association shall not release the association as indorser, and that all extensions shall be deemed to be granted at the association's request and for the purpose of protecting the association in its indorsement, and that the liability of the association shall not be terminated thereby, nor shall any notice to the association of such extension be necessary. The notices to the association, as provided for by section 25 of the farm loan act, are hereby expressly waived.

WHY IT IS ILLEGAL

From a casual reading of the above-proposed agreement it is obvious that the association would assume a liability far in excess of that provided by act of Congress, and the specific statement is made in the last sentence above that the association waives the protection thus provided.

It is equally obvious that this constitutes an illegal method of carrying out the business of the Federal farm loan system, and which one would scarcely expect the supervising officers to become partners to, even in their present hour of saving a wrecked farm loan system.

PROHIBITION PARALLEL

Congress has simply been smoking, so hot has its Halls been, with recent prohibition discussions. To select a popular parallel let us assume that the present staff of the Prohibition Unit were to mail people in all States an amendment to that act which would legalize the use of alcoholic drinks possessed of several degrees more "kick" than at present established in the act. Would that be considered either legal or ethical?

Or suppose that the Federal Reserve Board were to submit, through their branch banks the suggestion that national-bank members of the association were to assume liabilities in excess of that established by law. Would such a campaign be carried on quietly, secretly, while the head of the system was handing out propaganda to the effect that "everything is quiet and prosperous along the line"?

UNJUST TREATMENT OF FARMERS

Only farming is called upon to suffer under such political mismanagement of its financial affairs. Only during such transactions—shady as they are—are Senators able to remain quietly seated and not even consider the advisability of an investigation for the purpose to correcting the ills that now, as long since, beset the Federal farm loan system.

Had Senator BLEASE's proposal to investigate the system been carried out last May this might have been averted. Farmers might have been saved the untold millions they must now pay. It is worthy of note that the land banks made no move to suggest the illegal liability limit until after the Senate had adjourned and the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency had properly killed the proposed investigation. Another Teapot Dome subject for future historians to set down in nasty colors.

THE COMING SCANDAL—THE STORY OF A GREAT FARM TRAGEDY

A huge political intrigue that is actually being faced to-day in 476,000 American farm homes and that is likely to be suppressed to-morrow by the secret bureaus in Washington because it tells the truth.

If you want the inside secrets of the great farm problem, read The Coming Scandal, by Xeno W. Putnam, Harmonsburg, Pa. Price 50 cents, postpaid.

$1,161,248,120 IN FEDERAL FARM LOAN BONDS

Issues by 12 land banks have been advertised and marketed, in part through the United States mails, as based upon first-lien mortgages against farm property worth at least double their face. The mortgages that underwrite $385,000,000 of these bonds, issued by 4 Federal land banks, and for which the 12 land banks are responsible, are not first liens.

Wherever bonds that have been issued against them have been sold as such they have been fraudulently sold and the money taken for them has been obtained under false pretense.

The whole story of this fraud and the official proof of it is told in The Coming Scandal.

While avoiding a congressional investigation, the ex officio chairman of the Farm Loan Board recently stated that he knew of nothing materially wrong with the land banks. Within his term of office two land-bank cashiers have committed suicide; there have been confessed defalcations; a dead loss to one land bank of $1,300,000 has been disclosed by the farm loan commissioner to the House Banking and Currency Committee; $8,000,000 foreclosures face another land bank; the 12 land banks are now water-logged with some $16,000,000 of farms taken over.

For the benefit of agriculture the Sixty-fourth Congress in 1916 passed the Federal farm loan act.

For the benefit of their own confederates bureaucratic politics passed an amendment which canceled in many parts the one enacted by Congress.

One hundred and twenty-eight thousand farmers, in 10 States, have been sandbagged by the pseudo law out of almost $23,000,000 in farm equities, which, under every right of property, belonged to them absolutely, and 10 States were defrauded by that amount of agricultural working capital to which, by every legal right, they were entitled.

Just how this was done, and how the fraud has been made continuing in spite of the heavy penalties provided in the congressional law, is fully explained in The Coming Scandal.

To administer and protect their new farm banking system, Congress created one more Federal bureau, equipped it with its official machinery, and fixed the salary of all its important officers. But bureaucratic politics soon created a new executive, over the heads of Congress and the President, at a salary greater than the Federal Government pays the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court or any Federal officer, the President alone excepted. And the farmers are compelled to pay that salary—the 476,000 farmers who have borrowed money through their own banks. They are still paying it.

The Coming Scandal tells exactly how this was done and who did it. It also tells who is getting that salary.

$1,275 REWARD

And all expenses will be paid for breaking up a home that now belongs to an industrious farmer, for scattering his family, for sending his boys to the gang, and his daughters to the streets.

The above reward is now posted in more than 750 courthouses in 10 States by the direction of a Federal bureau. In some of these the reward has been doubled. In all of them the requirements are the same.

Has such a reward been posted in the courthouse of your county? For the wrecking of your home? The Coming Scandal will tell you if you wish to know.

A REWARD FOR FRAUDULENT INSURANCE—LEGITIMATE POLICIES PENALIZED BY LAND BANK ORDERS

The Federal farm loan act entitles a farmer to a loan up to 50 per cent of the value of his land, plus 20 per cent of the value of his buildings.

Some of the land banks require that an insurance policy be carried upon the buildings equal to the total loan upon buildings and land.

You may get a full legal allotment of your loan if you can obtain an insurance policy on a fraudulently high valuation, and can get away with it. Otherwise, you can go to prison or with only a fraction of the loan to which, under the act, your property is entitled. The Coming Scandal gives the facts and the proofs complete.

WHY?

On 28 days within the last 11 weeks of the congressional session which closed on May 29, 1928, the Federal farm loan system held the Senate floor from a few minutes to as many hours each day.

It cost the Government more than $5,000 just to print the report of this determined effort to force an official investigation of the system in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

What the desperate attempt of the secret powers to resist this investigation cost and how much of the expense was paid out of the farmers' land banks is another matter.

With a very few exceptions not one mention was made of this desperate fight in behalf of, and against, the farmers' banks by that boasted sponsor of liberty and fearlessness, and freedom of speech—the American press.

Only a handful of the 333 farm publications, with a claimed circulation of some 27,000,000, told their people of Senate Resolution No. 167, or of what a secret bureau was doing to their land banks.

That silence cost the farm loan members (the farmers) more than $1,500,000 in foreclosures; it burdened agriculture with a few hundred more abandoned farms; it broke up homes, perhaps sent a few discouraged sons of the soil to the gangs and farm daughters to the streets; it crowded still more into the ranks of the great army of unemployed job hunters in the back yards of industry. Perhaps it cost some of the land banks a few of the rewards they had posted.

Wouldn't you think it worth while to know about these things and the remedy for them if you knew that this was soon to happen to your home? The answer is in The Coming Scandal.

DID YOU EVER WONDER WHY POLITICS

For the past eight years has been earnestly talking in behalf of farm relief and is still just talking?

Why Muscle Shoals, with all of its endless fertilizer possibilities for the farmer, has thus far only produced a harvest of barren regrets in the garden of great expectations?

Why Boulder Dam, with its immense opportunities for power achievement, never has been permitted to reach the achieving stage?

Why the Federal farm loan system takes the cleanest of its service out of such vile-smelling pork barrels?

Why farm loan officials conceal their accounts and records from their own stockholders as though the first belonged to America's secret service division in time of war and the second to her bitterest enemy?

Why the annual reports of the Farm Loan Board to Congress are now suppressed until the adjournment of Congress, even though they are announced as ready months before?

Why so many suicides among land-bank officials, so many defalcations, so many millions of losses, so many foreclosures, so many abandoned farms taken over, so many lapsed dividends, and so much secrecy about the dividends waterlogging the system, if everything is as good and prosperous as its officials announce?

Why it is not permitted any friend of the system to offer constructive criticism without being branded a sworn enemy to the system and a traitor to the farmer?

THE COMING SCANDAL

Answers all of these questions and it tells the remedy. The writer speaks from the knowledge gained by six years of determined and very much obstructed research, and he gives you official proof of his statements.

His inquiry began both in faith and friendship for the system. It has continued in friendship for it and in the sustaining faith that it may yet be saved.

WHAT'S WHERE

In a recent circular announcement of The Coming Scandal the writer promised that the book would establish the following reasons why the public should demand and should be given a complete investigation of the Federal farm loan system, doing business and with the public.

First. That more than $1,000,000,000 of farm loan bonds have been sold to the public under false pretenses; that these bonds are not entirely secured by first lien farm mortgages; that more than $350,000,000 of those mortgages are not first liens.

For the keeping of that promise see Chapter II.

Second. That 128,000 farmers in 10 States have been forcibly robbed of $23,000,000 in good commercial credits by four land banks with the official sanction of the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Chapter II also covers the keeping of this promise.

Third. That the ex-officio chairman of the Federal Farm Loan Board, and a member of the President's Cabinet, during a recent effort of the board to prevent investigation, stated that he knew of no unusual condition existing in the banks; that at the time that statement was made board members knew of losses amounting to millions, of embezzlements, of account juggling, of conditions that have led to suicides, to resignations, to indictments, confessions, and imprisonments.

The promised evidence of this will be found in Chapter IV.

Fourth. That a $1,275 reward has been publicly posted by four land banks and the Farm Loan Board for the breaking up of families and homes.

Read Chapter XIII for this and reread Chapter II.

Fifth. That rewards for fraudulent fire insurance policies have been offered by land banks and with Farm Loan Board authority. That honesty among borrowers has been penalized by these land banks and boards.

Chapter III gives the evidence directly from official records and literature.

Sixth. That farmers who are in debt have been compelled by a political trick, arranged by the land banks and with the board's sanction, to pay a higher salary than the United States Government pays to any officer, the President alone excepted. That Members of the Congress, which had itself fixed the salaries, have declared this one wholly unauthorized and unnecessary.

Flappers of the law, Chapter IX, tells how this was done and who did it.

Seventh. That invisible government has hushed the press and kept the knowledge of gigantic frauds from the knowledge of the people.

The story of this appears in Chapter VI.

Eighth. That the silence has been costing the people millions of dollars in money, in criminality, in congested employment channels, in ruined homes, and in abandoned farms.

Read Chapter VIII if you wish to know.

Ninth. That farm loan officials have been protecting embezzlements and robbery of the farmers with fraudulent bank examinations, concealed banking accounts, threats, public indorsements, suppressed reports, and jumbled figures.

Read Chapter V for the evidence, and also Chapter VI.

Tenth. There are several other charges not made in the circular—and the remedy.

Read all of the other chapters and find the whole of them, then write and tell your Congressman, or the author, whether you think an investigation of the Federal farm loan system is needed.

URGE LAND BANK PLAN—REORGANIZATION OF INSTITUTION HERE BEFORE BOARD THURSDAY

WASHINGTON.—Approval of a plan for the reorganization of the Kansas City Joint Stock Lank Bank, which has been in a receivership since May 4, 1927, will be sought here Thursday from the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Massey Holmes, of Kansas City, attorney for the bondholders' protective committee, and Herman Langworthy, receiver, arrived here Monday to prepare for the hearing. Walter S. McLucas, of Kansas City, chairman of the bondholders' committee, and others interested in the reorganization, will arrive later in the week.

The bondholders' committee will submit the plan for the reorganization of the bank formerly headed by Walter M. Cravens. The stockholders also will be represented at the hearing.

"If the plan is approved," Mr. Langworthy said, "the Kansas City bank will be reorganized and continue to operate."

[Extract from address delivered in United States Senate Chamber by CHARLES CURTIS, of Kansas]

CHARLEY ALWAYS IS RIGHT

Under the syndicate arrangement adopted for selling farm-loan bonds it looks as if brokers get the premiums and that the land banks are getting no particular advantage from the tax exemptions of their securities.

LET FARMERS RUN THEIR OWN BANKS

Would it not therefore be better to let the farmers themselves manage these banks exactly as the law intends? The only change necessary for this would be to give the farmers the entire responsibility for the system and oblige them to operate on their own unquestionably good credit.

IT IS THE SECRET OF SOUND FINANCE

This is the secret of the soundness and success of innumerable borrowers' banks of various kinds, among which failures are rarer than among ordinary banks. The 65,000 cooperative credit societies, with 15,000,000 members and $7,000,000,000 of annual business in the world, are based on this idea of using their own credit and of imposing upon members a liability that is either unlimited or else severe enough to be felt. The cooperative bank with unlimited or limited liability has proved its worth wherever tried, in country, town, or city, for encouraging thrift and extending credit in large or small amounts.

IT WORKS EVERYWHERE BEST

The same idea prevails in all true building and loan associations among the 7,269 with 3,858,612 members and $1,769,142,175 assets in the United States. Any member getting a loan must subscribe for shares up to its full amount. His payments are made not on the mortgage but on the shares. When the shares mature he may turn them in and have his debt canceled. The maturing of the shares depends upon his payments and also upon the association's profit and loss. All his credits could be wiped out by a loss, consequently he is liable to the full amount of his mortgage. Profits would hasten the extinction of his debt; and so he is as deeply interested as are nonborrowing members. As a result these associations can operate even on savings with safety, although the borrowers participate in the management.

THE GERMANS DO NOT HAVE POLITICAL WET NURSES TO RUN THEIR LAND BANKS

The landschafts, started 150 years ago, are composed entirely of borrowers. They now number 23, with about $1,000,000,000 of bonds; and none of them ever defaulted an obligation. The borrowers elect all the officers and appraisers, every one of whom must also be a borrower. The borrowers' payments go into a sinking fund, in which the cash on hand, together with the unpaid principal of the loans, must equal outstanding bonds. If this fund becomes impaired in the old landschafts, any member may be assessed without limit for the deficiency. In some of the newer landschafts the liability is limited to the mortgage or some portion of it. But the basic idea in all is that the borrowers have the direct management, use their own credit, and assume liability large enough to be felt.

Nearly all American districts established under State laws for sanitary, mining, or agricultural drainage embody landschaft features. Their bonded indebtedness amounts to millions of dollars. The bonds are not instruments of the State or Federal Government. They are obligations only of the districts. But through the district's right to levy assessments they are secured by the collective ability of the owners of the benefited property and so are easily marketed at reasonable interest rates, although these beneficiaries of the issue also elect the managers.

With these successful instances of borrowers' banks here and in foreign countries, Congress should not hesitate or delay in placing the Federal land banks under the management and the responsibility of the farmers. By so doing the farmers, and not rich investors, would get the advantage of all premiums on the bonds.

[Extracts from letter from a secretary-treasurer of a farm loan association]

NEITHER SAFE NOR VERY HAPPY!

The Farm Loan Board is now carrying on a national joke contest. They wish to know whether farmers are "safe or sorry." As for the first, surely they are not overly safe if they depend upon the present type of political manipulators to safeguard their interests any more than the folks are who have dipped into their pockets and bought more than $1,500,000,000 of the bonds issued under the direction of that board. Most of the farmers are terribly sorry that they ever got into the system, and they are in more an even sadder time unless Congress steps in and helps them out. This is the crying child of the new era of "farm relief." Already the farmers have been "relieved" too severely by the politicians; now for a piece of real farm relief by putting the land banks into the hands of the farmers, who now fully own them.

If you can read the following advertisement which land bank officials are running in farm papers without breaking into a smile, you are as hard as flint:

"SAFE OR SORRY?

"It hurts to lose hard-earned money. Better to take a conservative return in interest than to risk the principal. Thousands of farmers appreciate the stability of income, marketability, ready collateral, and tax exemption of Federal land bank bonds. Interest is paid twice yearly. The public, including farmers, have expressed their confidence in these bonds by purchasing more than a billion and a half dollars' worth in the last 12 years. They are mutually guaranteed by the 12 cooperative Federal land banks, which have capital, legal reserve, and undivided profits in excess of $80,000,000.

"TO FIT ANY POCKETBOOK

"Federal land bank bonds are issued in denominations of $40, $100, $500, $1,000, $5,000, and $10,000. They can be turned into cash upon short notice and are excellent collateral upon which to borrow.

"Price and current rate will be gladly quoted upon request to the nearest Federal land bank."

Even Will Rogers, the famous wit, would not be able to go this bunch one better, for they open right up by saying that "It hurts to lose hard-earned money." What sort of a joke are they trying to play on the thousands of farmers who are now, as for months, nay, years past, lost money by having their land banks run by politicians instead of the rightful representatives, selected and elected by the farmer owners.

My, but they do play up that "Legal reserve and undivided profits in excess of $80,000,000"! Wonder what the real facts would be if they paid up the losses they have suffered by reason of foreclosure of farm mortgage and mismanagement of their officers?

The land banks have went and hired themselves a jokesmith!

But they can't get much of a laugh out the farmers they have served (?).

[Extract from a farm owner who foresees critical days ahead for agriculture if financial agencies are not kept free from domination of politicians and centralized administration]

THE MENACE OF THE MONEY MASTERS

Fluid finance, placed in the hands and under the control of men of honest vision, may well become a blessing to mankind; if vested under the control of selfish interests, the opposite may easily become a great menace.

Let us consider, for example, the present control of money in the United States. Appearing in the Sunday New York Times, there was recently a financial statement that boasted of the fact that "284 banks hold 73 per cent of the total deposits." In part, the article said:

"There were at the close of 1928 approximately 23,000 commercial banks in the United States, with total deposits of $36,750,000,000. Of these banks 284 had deposits of $20,000,000 and upward, with aggregate deposits of $26,822,752,000, or 73 per cent of the deposits of all.

"These 284 banks, as tabulated by Financial Age, in their order according to their deposit standing on December 31, and compared with their standings one year and five years ago, show the great trend of consolidations into large units. Of the larger banks on the list there are 61 which have deposits ranging from $100,000,000 to more than $1,000,000,000, and 54 which have deposits from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000.

The above tabulation clearly demonstrates that, of the 61 banks listed above, the deposits of these institutions equal approximately 48 per cent of the aggregate deposits of the entire commercial banking systems of the United States, both national and State banks.

WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?

Clearly does this demonstate that Congress should exercise the greatest of discretion in consideration of all financial subjects, and that the crux of solving the muted agricultural problem is that of safeguarding the farmer's finance, since he must needs depend upon the controlled arteries of money for his liquid aid. The Federal farm loan system should be vested in control of governmental supervising agency, or one commissioner, with clerks to assist, and the actual management vested in hands of the directors of national farm loan associations and Federal land banks elected by farmer owners, as are national banks. Otherwise, centralized finance will smother the farmer.

NORTH DAKOTA SEES WANE OF SOCIALISM

By Herbert Lefkovitz, editorial correspondent of the New York Times

ST. PAUL, January 18.—North Dakota's experiment in State socialism has almost run its course. It is 14 years since A. C. Townley started "taking around" his typewritten sheets containing the millennial program with which, it was confidently expected, North Dakota would set the example for the world. It is 12 years since a fascinated and excited legislature nailed the seven major articles of faith to the flagstaff of the capitol at Bismarck.

STATE-OWNED LAND BANK SOCIALISTIC SURVIVOR

Now about all that remains are a State bank, which does only a rural credit business; a State mill and elevator, which are the subjects of endless controversy; and a few of the supplementary minor items, such as State hail insurance, State fire insurance on public buildings, and State bonding of public officers. As for the Non-Partisan League, which began as a bipartisan league, it has become merely the name of one faction of the Republican Party in North Dakota.

HANDICAPS OF SOCIALISM OUTLINED BY FORMER LEADER IN HIS VALEDICTORY ADDRESS

North Dakota has just inaugurated a new governor in keeping with the seriousness with which politics are taken in North Dakota. The process there is a little more extended than in most places. There is, of course, the usual weighty address or message of the new governor, but it is also required that the departing chief leave some formal report of his stewardship.

The farewell message of Governor Maddock is an example of the chastened spirit. In 1917 there was no believer so fiery or zealous as Walter Maddock. He was a sort of general whip and floor leader for Mr. Townley. Twelve years later he says:

"I do not consider that the management of the (State) mill and elevator has reached anything like perfection, but great improvements have been made and more can be made, and now, with a better public appreciation of the work being done, it will be much easier to accomplish all that the institution was intended to accomplish. There are handicaps in public or State ownership of any industrial plant that are hard to overcome, and we may look for a bright future when a farmer-owned cooperative organization such as the Farmers' Union has developed to a degree capable of taking over the operation of the mill and elevator with proper State control."

NO "BRIGHT FUTURE" FOR SOCIALISM

The new governor, George F. Shafer, classifies as a conservative. In other words, as an independent voters' association Republican. He has forebodings for State ownership similar to those of Mr. Maddock except that he does not call them a "bright future." North Dakota has been considering how grain storage may be improved in the State.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL GETS THE GATE

Governor Shafer makes it clear that he will entertain no plan for new State-owned elevators. He announces his opposition to State ownership of private business "as a matter of principle." He predicts that "should the State expand its program of State-owned elevators, it would not only result in a greatly increased State debt by many millions of dollars, but it would involve the people in endless political controversy over the questions of management."

DEBTS ARE ONLY BENEFACTION OF POLITICAL MANIPULATORS

The 1915 program is almost a complete ruin. Nothing is left of the State creamery except debts. The grain grading law was twice passed and twice invalidated by the United States Supreme Court. Although the income tax remains, the attempt to apply single-tax principles to farm lands has been abandoned. The project to mine the coal on State lands was postponed and now is forgotten.

POLITICAL BOODLERS WRECK LAND BANK SYSTEM

Adversity overtook North Dakota in the agricultural depression of 1921 and for this and other reasons the State building loan fund is out some $400,000. The State bank, which was to dominate the financial system of North Dakota, and the State mill and elevator, which were to be the nucleus of a great terminal market, continue, but unpretentiously.

It was the original plan to place this ambitious system of State-owned business under commission rule. The legislators, accordingly, created the industrial commission consisting of the governor, the commissioner of agriculture and labor, and the attorney general. With the gradual abandonment of the program, this commission has become almost nonexistent and for several years its activities have been confined practically to operation of the State bank.

NO RESPONSE TO GROWING CRITICISM

In 1925 the most important of its industrial responsibilities was removed when the late Gov. A. G. Sorlie decided that full control should be placed in his hands. The legislature consented to this arrangement, but the affairs of the mill showed no improvement and in 1927, in response to growing criticism, a fact-finding commission was appointed by the legislature to investigate and report on the situation.

INACTION IN FACE TO CRISIS—A STRIKING PARALLEL TO THE HANDLING OF THE FEDERAL FARM LOAN SYSTEM'S POLITICAL SICKNESS BY UNITED STATES SENATE

A special session of the legislature assembled in 1928, received a report from this commission that the mill and elevator had been badly mismanaged, and then adjourned without taking action.

SIMILAR TO THE SENATE, RADICALS WOULD PUT AND KEEP GOVERNMENT IN PRIVATE BUSINESS

Nevertheless there does persist in North Dakota some lingering hope that a great public-owned terminal grain system is yet possible. It is held by the more radical wing of the Non-Partisan League and has caused a well-marked division in the organization.

The Non-Partisan League is the left wing of the Republican Party of the State, but it also has divisions to the left and right. The more conservative group, as represented by the Farmers' Union of North Dakota, is in alliance with Governor Shafer to oppose this idea.

[NOTE.—The President to be has said much about bureaucratic forms of government, as especially related to his forthcoming administration, most of which is true. What will he do about the most striking illustration of all—the Federal farm loan system—whereby hundreds of thousands of farmers have had their own capital stock taken away from them and their 12 Federal land banks operated by the political puppets of Mellon, Meyer, et al.? Will Herbert Hoover do more than talk about this? Other Republicans—Harding and Coolidge—said a great deal, but did even less when given the opportunity of correcting the criminal methods of their own unfaithful appointees. However, the following extracts from an article printed in the Sunday New York Times of January 21, 1929, may show what Hoover really thinks (when speaking for publication), even though it does not forecast what he may do when Mellon dominates the Treasury Department's illegal confiscation of farm-owned land banks.]

[From Sunday New York Herald-Tribune, January 21, 1929]

HOOVER IS AGAINST "BIG BROTHER" IDEA—POLICY OF INTERVENTION WILL NOT PREVAIL HERE, HE TELLS ARGENTINE ECONOMIST—DISAPPROVES BUREAUCRACY—WARNS OF DANGERS OF GOVERNMENT CONTROL

Herbert Hoover is quoted as having disapproved of the "big brother" idea among nations and as having warned of the dangers of intervention and of bureaucracy in an interview with Alejandro E. Bunge, Argentine economist and engineer, who talked with the President elect on his visit to Argentina.

He quotes Mr. Hoover as follows:

"The importance of social experiments in a nation in development, such as ours, is illustrated by the examples of interventions of the Government in the public services and in the industries in the United States, or their systems of education or the manner of recruiting leaders in creative economic action."

Señor Bunge quotes Mr. Hoover as having said that the experience of the United States in connection with governmental control of industries was a complete failure, particularly in the case of Government operation of railroads. The interview continues:

"Our experience regarding the intervention of the State in the public services and in industries was extended to other countries. Will it not be advantageous for them and for those which have not yet made such experiments to know that the result of ours was a complete failure?

BUREAUCRACY CRUSHES INDIVIDUAL INITIATIVE

"Bureaucracy creates a spirit of submission in the daily life and penetrates the spirit of the people, not with the manner of a strong resistance to what is bad but in the manner of a timid acceptance of an irresistible power. In addition, competition is incompatible with bureaucracy because the former exists only in a free atmosphere of action and reaction. And without competition there is no progress in creative business. New methods, new ideas, are a projection of a spirit of adventure or of individual initiative and of individual enterprise; without adventure, without risk, there is no progress. No governmental administration can undertake risks with the money of its taxpayers.

OTHER TASKS FOR GOVERNMENT

"Among the examples of governmental incompetence to direct business which our country has to offer few are perhaps so eloquent as the history of our railways, facts already universally known. Bureaucracy endeavors always to develop its influence and its power until it converts itself into the master of the souls and of the thoughts of the people.

IF THIS BE TRUE, TURN LAND BANKS BACK TO LEGAL OWNERS—THE FARMERS

"In my country everyone now considers it obvious that it is not a function of the Government to administer industries, but that there are a thousand other tasks for it: To compile and distribute economic information, to investigate economic and scientific problems, indicate the road to progress, and inspire and aid the industrialists in the reduction of bad methods and of waste in the use of raw materials.

FOR DIVERSIFIED LEADERSHIP

Mr. Hoover is then quoted by Señor Bunge as having said that the new era just beginning was one undoubtedly of "industrial self-government"; also as having said that there was nothing more pernicious for a society than to recruit its leaders from a single governing social group.

WOULD PROTECT FARMERS FROM POLITICAL LAWYERS OF FEDERAL LAND BANKS

On page 4476 of the RECORD, March 12, 1928, was published the shameful story of the illegal and confiscatory method employed by Federal land banks, with the consent and knowledge of the supervising Federal Farm Loan Board, whereby millions of farmers had been made to pay extortionate fees when being moved off their farms. This was the result of an exhaustive survey made by Xeno W. Putnam, Harmonsburg, Pa., former secretary-treasurer of the Crawford County (Pa.) National Farm Loan Association, which he founded, and which he has endeavored for the past few months to free from the grip of the fee-grabbing attorney who shoves local farmers off farms for the Baltimore Federal Land Bank.

It is of interest to note that at least one State has taken action to free farmers of their extortionate charges, which in many instances have aggregated one-half of a loan of $2,000 to $3,000—or payments of a fee of from $1,000 to $1,500 to the land-bank attorney.

New Jersey is the State that may boast of this honor; and if the proposed mortgage laws are passed, as indications seem ripe now, it will no longer be possible for attorneys of the Springfield (Mass.) Federal Land Bank to wax fat off extortionate fees charged in foreclosure cases as in the past. Thus we see how local State governments are under the necessity of passing acts to secure simple justice for their people who unfortunately come within the scope of a bureaucratic Federal Farm Loan Board's grip.

[Extract from article appearing in Farm and Fireside, New York]

VITAL BANK FACTS ARE WITHHELD FROM OWNERS

By Huston Thompson, former member of the Federal Trade Commission, in an interview with Mrs. Gertrude Mathews Shelby, specialist in cooperative credit and writer

Farmers who own the stock of the 12 Federal land banks of the Federal farm loan system are worse off than stockholders in any other reputable enterprise in the United States.

OWNERS DEPRIVED OF PROPERTY RIGHTS

In any normal corporation the holder of securities automatically receives by mail an annual financial statement which deals with that enterprise and no other.

Farmers who own stock in the 12 district Federal land banks receive no annual report without solicitation. If they send to the Federal Farm Loan Bureau or the Superintendent of Documents in Washington for information they receive a pamphlet of some 50 pages, addressed, as required by statute, to Congress, not to the stockholders.

[NOTE.—Eugene Meyer, farm loan commissioner, under the orders of Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, made the world's record for long-distance withholding of the annual report last year. It was dated and should have been filed with the Senate not later than January, 1928. However, after the Senate adopted a resolution demanding the report late in May, it was released only after Congress had adjourned. No comment is necessary.]

JUMBLED FIGURES, AND NOT FACTS, STATED

This report contains a consolidated statement of the assets and liabilities of the 12 district Federal land banks, in which the figures are lumped. It does not give separately financial statements showing the exact condition of each land bank, although complete separate statements are necessary to judge the welfare of the system.

Since the farm loan is so organized that the liabilities or losses of 1 bank are in the end the liabilities and losses of the other 11, every stockholder has a right to demand this information. Every investor in farm loan bonds would be protected by such publicity.

EXPERTS CAN NOT UNDERSTAND THE GARBLED FIGURES

This annual report of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau to Congress covers not only the billion and a half dollar Federal land bank system, the 12 intermediate credit banks, but also includes the annual statements of some 50 joint-stock land banks.

All three are discussed in the report to the confusion of any but an expert in farm credits. Even for such an expert or an accountant the information given is wholly inadequate.

FARMER CAN NOT KNOW WHAT IS GOING ON

If this report is not sufficient for such an expert to comprehend, the stockholder on the farm may conclude that he is not supposed to understand it.

Yet here is the predicament shared by close to 500,000 farmers: To get his loan he was compelled under the act to purchase stock in the land bank of this district. This was justifiable because farmer stockholders were guaranteed control. They were not permitted complete self-management as in all true cooperatives, but they were assured the right to elect the majority of the directors of the land bank in which they owned stock.

RIGHTS TAKEN AWAY FROM FARMER OWNERS

In 1923, upon the recommendation of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau, the law was amended. Without the full knowledge of Congress stockholders were deprived of majority control, having thereafter the right to elect only the minority of each land bank board.

FARMERS NOW OWN ALL BANK STOCK

To create the farm-loan system farmers pooled lands worth about $3,000,000,000 as security for half as many loans. They put up hard cash in addition, one-fifth the amount of their loans as capital stock. They assumed liabilities to the extent of 10 per cent of their loans in addition. Yet the dissemination of essential information was not assured, nor were stockholders encouraged to feel that they owned their banks and had free rein in their local farm loan associations.

NOT TREATED FAIRLY LIKE OTHER BANK-STOCK OWNERS

When they became members of the system, bought stock, and received their loans, they were given no certificates of stock. Individually they had nothing except a receipt for money paid to show that they had actually invested in the system.

Upon the advice of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau the local associations generally employed nonstockholders, bankers, or business men as secretary-treasurers. Secretaries were not primarily disposed to make a business of disseminating even such information as they received about Federal farm loan affairs.

The stockholders have been prohibited by the Federal Farm Loan Bureau from supporting out of the funds of their own local associations a national federation through which they could voice organized opposition to anything they considered either a neglect or an abuse of power.

WHEN IGNORANCE IS BLISS TO POLITICIANS

Without the general knowledge of the farmers who foot the bill expenses of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau in Washington have swelled to enormous proportions. If stockholders sent to Washington for the annual report, they would not have found it in this item nor any statement of the expenses of the fiscal agent, his staff, and the offices for which farmers pay rent.

THE FARMER "PAYS THE FREIGHT" FOR THE POLITICIAN'S RIDE

Farmers pay many hundreds of employees throughout the system who are political appointees, yet as stockholders have no uncontested way of finding out what it costs to maintain this huge force, including some 600 appraisers and examiners constantly traveling over the immense districts.

GIVE THE FARMERS A SQUARE DEAL

Under such conditions it may be seen that the importance of information about all and every expenditure is greater than in the case of stockholders in ordinary corporations.

Uncle Sam is morally in the position of trustee for those whom Congress has deprived of power to help themselves.

The Federal Farm Loan Bureau can be a model in the matter of giving stockholders essential information. In language a layman could understand it might render a model service. In this great cooperative credit pool the bonds are all sold through a syndicate. An annual report should provide stockholders and bond buyers with a record of all agreements under which these bonds are distributed. It should furnish a list of the investment houses participating in the sale of each and every issue. It should give the exact report of commissions or bonuses received. A separate statement of the assets and liabilities of each bank should supplement the present consolidated statement in the annual report.

SUGGESTED BUSINESSLIKE REPORT TO STOCKHOLDERS

Additional information should cover the following points for each land bank for each fiscal year:

1. Gross earnings.
2. Deductions: Interest; commissions and expenses of sale of bonds; operating expenses.
3. Net earnings.
4. Disposition of net earnings: Dividends paid; carried to reserve account; carried to suspense account; undivided profits.
5. Dividend rate for each dividend payment.
6. Amount of stock upon which each dividend rate was paid.

PRIVATE CORPORATIONS ADVISE STOCKHOLDERS—WHY NOT FARM LOAN?

Prof. W. Z. Ripley considers the financial and general reports of the United States Steel and General Electric Corporations the best in the country.

Why should not stockholders of the Federal farm-loan system get treatment equal to that furnished by the security holders of these private corporations?

Certainly no right of control or management to which corporations are entitled should be denied to cooperative enterprises capitalized entirely with farmers' money.

EVERY TAXPAYER HAS SOMETHING AT STAKE NOW

So long as politically appointed men run a system which controls a lending power too vast to realize, extending over the entire country, every ordinary citizen has something at stake. If we are to marry political control of lending power, we must guard against the development of the danger of government by secrecy.

[Article appearing in Farmers' National Magazine]

THE SAD STORY OF THE FARM LOAN SYSTEM

No movement in the history of the world was ever instituted with more unselfish ideas and ideals than was the Federal farm loan system when placed upon the statute books of the United States by Congress in 1916. When President Wilson signed that act, he and his administration gave to the American farmer possible freedom from their ancient enemy—financial want. Properly administered, agriculture might have been adequately assisted, as were commerce and industry. The Federal farm loan act was widely heralded as "the American farmers' declaration of independence," since it offered freedom from the intolerable credit conditions and liberation from the shackles of private money lenders, who were exacting as high as 10 and 12 per cent interest and making farm-mortgage loans for only a short term of years with extortionate renewal commissions and fees.

WHAT REPUBLICAN CORRUPTION DID

For the first four or five years, although the Federal Farm Loan Bureau of the Treasury was officered by a majority of commissioners not even mildly conversant with the needs of agriculture, since they entirely lacked previous contact with the industry—in spite of this handicap they energetically set about establishing the system as contemplated in the act. The fact that they selected as officers of the district Federal land banks men of their own viewpoint, not acquainted with agriculture, soon manifest itself in the failure or utter neglect of the banks to adequately serve farming interests.

Then in 1920 the Harding administration, with its blighting influence, its corruption, and its contravention to American ideals and ideas, was swept into power. By this time the Federal farm loan system was something to brag about, although it had been given to the American farmer by the Democratic administration over the protest, bitter and narrow, on the part of many Republican Congressmen and Senators, yet it was now a great system, holding forth the glittering promise of political patronage. And there were such a vast herd of "worthies" to be paid that this army was soon sweeping down and upon the Federal farm loan system, and many were the gang that became entrenched in soft jobs at fancy prices. The beginning of the end was now in sight.

EIGHT YEARS OF RUINOUS RULE

The Republicans, in eight terrible years of ruinous rule—the Harding and Coolidge administrations—have emasculated this farm credit system, have withheld its full benefits, and have even turned it to uses hostile to the interests of the great basic industry it was intended to serve. This record is not one that patriotic Americans will wish taught to their children; it is one of the sad stories of political plunder run mad, plucking plums from the farmers' pudding.

Under the ruinous administration the Federal land banks were soon obliged to adopt a policy of writing off their books 100 per cent of all foreclosed loans—and there were utterly thousands of these. This policy, in turn, forced a vast volume of land on the auction block; it meant forced sale of farm lands in such huge quantities as to depress land values throughout the country. Had men of vision, intelligence, and a heart been in charge of the affairs of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau, and had their appointees in the 12 district Federal land banks scattered over the country been men of similar experience, this great system might easily have been used to stabilize farm land values. But actually it forced a "land panic" from which neither agriculture nor the farmer has as yet been able to either extricate the industry nor himself. In thousands of communities he is now in a helpless, hopeless condition, and there can be no lasting nor permanently assured farm relief until the Federal farm loan system has been plucked wholeheartedly from the pillaging crew of politicians and vested under the control of the farmer owners. Farmers by the thousands, seeing the equities in their land shrink or disappear entirely, abandoned the soil. This policy of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau and its dummies in the Federal land banks, either directly or indirectly, cost hundreds of millions in losses to farm families, many of whom were absolutely "shoved" off their land.

DISHONESTY RULES IN FEDERAL LAND BANKS

Then, in 1923, through underhanded and dishonest methods, control over the 12 district Federal land banks was stolen from the farmer owners, who have paid for the capitalization of these banks and were rightful owners of same exactly as stockholders own our National and State banks. At the time these 12 banks were capitalized at approximately $61,000,000 of hard-earned, crop-made money by the farmers themselves not one cent of this capital had been contributed by a single member of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau nor a political appointee in any Federal land bank. The original farm loan act of 1916, passed by a Democratic Congress and signed by a Democratic President, had promised these farmers that when they had repaid to the treasury of their land bank the money advanced for the purposes of establishing them that the said bank and its functions should be turned over to the farmer owners. This, remember, is entirely American and is the basic foundation of all sound banking in this country. To do otherwise would be contrary to the Constitution, which makes full provision for the safeguarding of personal property rights.

However, in 1923, through as underhanded and dishonest a political trick as was ever effected upon any particular class of people, control over the 12 Federal land banks was stolen from the farmer owners. These land banks were capitalized, remember, with $61,000,000 of farmer-contributed money. However, "Judge" Charles E. Lobdell, former county politician from Kansas, acting as farm loan commissioner, prepared an amendment to the fundamental farm loan act which was a virtual revision of its workings and intent and as un-American a piece of legislative business as was ever "put over."

WHO THE HEROES (?) WERE AND ARE

There was Congressman STRONG of Kansas, who introduced the bill in the House, where it was lobbied through by the Federal Farm Loan Bureau gang, assisted by alleged "pressure" which appeared to come from "back home," but which was really staged by the very men whom the board has named and were at the time "eating from the crib" at the expense of the farmer they deprived of property-right control. The Senate never even considered this radical plan to deprive the farmer of his voting power of the capital-stock shares which he had paid for in accordance with the provisions of the Federal farm loan act.

But this outrage against American agriculture and decent methods of considering and passing important legislation was consummated in the Senate by administration hacks. In a conference between the two Houses on the intermediate credits act the Strong bill was concealed within as Title III. At the eleventh hour of the session the intermediate credits act was reported. The Senate imagined it "was extending the farmer further financial assistance; the true purport of vicious Title III was not explained—that it took away powers granted by the Federal farm loan act without discussion, without even proper report (by Senator Charles McLean, Republican) that informed the Senate of the hidden clauses, the bill indefensibly became law, and the farmer stockholders were robbed of their power to vote their own land-bank shares!

Instead of the farmer owners of the 12 district Federal land banks having a clear majority of the directors to administer their own banks, they were given a reduced minority. To each land bank the stockholders now have the right to elect only three directors—one-half the number the original farm loan act provided them. The Government appoints, as before, three directors outright; the seventh, holding the balance of power, is supposed (and that is good—supposed) to be one of the three candidates voluntarily selected by the farmer stockholders. But do not overlook the little joker provided in the vicious amendment—the Farm Loan Board "selects"—the word is and has been trickily used—the leading candidate. Actually, the board names the seventh man. This steal of power was characterized by the Northwestern Stockman and Farmer as the "commission, by act of public legislation, of wholesale grand larceny." And the term is none too strong; it constitutes the greatest public steal of privately owned property ever effected and stands as a disgrace to American legislative acts.

TAKE CARE OF THE FRIENDS OF POLITICIANS

If any person is interested in knowing just why certain Members of the United States Senate are ever watchful that nothing is ever done to strengthen the farm loan act to provide superior service to the American farming interest and why said men are ever bending over backward to keep the system wholly under the domination of politicians, let us briefly investigate the interesting relation between some of these Senators and the men who constitute the officers of the Federal farm loan system.

For friends and relatives of influential Republicans, many of them absolutely unfitted for their particular tasks, incompetent in the extreme, have been appointed to important positions and kept there long after their incompetence has been known.

Glaring cases of favoritism in loans to certain States and certain individuals have been frequently brought to light. Enormous losses have resulted in the affairs of certain banks as a direct result of this favoritism dictating financial business.

There is, for example, a man by the name of Oran Layton, a Federal land bank examiner. He is a nephew of Senator CHARLES CURTIS, of Kansas, Vice President elect. Then there is that man who brought shame to the whole Federal farm loan system and who has "resigned" (instead of going to prison), ex-President H. C. Arnold, of the Federal Land Bank of Columbia, S. C., also ex-deputy warden of the Atlanta Penitentiary (whether he remained inside the cells or outside we haven't been advised, but he was at least in Atlanta). Arnold never had a minute's banking experience, even in a tiny 4-corner country bank, and held his position long after his incompetency was known, thanks to Republican political pull and pressure exercised by some of the men who deliver the most heart-rending addresses on the floor of the United States Senate and who tote a white lily palm in each hand when it comes to consideration of crime and corruption. We would neglect the opportunity of mentioning a vital fact did we forget to mention A. F. Cardon, chief reviewing appraiser of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau. He is a son-in-law of Senator SMOOT, of Utah. Further comment is unnecessary regarding this.

INEFFICIENCY KEEPS INTEREST RATE UP

Despite the fact that every other form of banking had rendered to borrowers lowered interest rates and that the provisions of the farm loan act are so elastic as to permit of almost immediate reduction of interest rate to the farmer borrowers, the interest rate had been kept at a high figure. This in face of the fact that publicity and propaganda widely broadcast by the board boasts of a $60,000,000 surplus in the land banks, or an average of $5,000,000 surplus in each bank.

Everyone who is conversant with and takes an intelligent interest in world affairs well knows that the United States now, as for months past, has been blessed by a prosperity in many lines, not including agriculture, which stands as an unsurpassed record in history. Lower and lower interest rates have characterized the trend in high-finance circles; never did industry, the railroads, commerce, or ordinary business secure financial assistance at better rates and terms.

It would be obvious that a strong centralized and consolidated nation-wide system of finance, such as the farm loan system now is, or should be, would be in a position to reap a few of the blessings thus prepared and made available by general trends in national affairs. Yet the fact is that more than 20 foreign countries, every one of which has faced and now faces financial "hard times," provide their farmers with funds at lower rates than does or has the Federal farm loan system. Yet this same system is the greatest in the world, whether measured by the total number of farmers served or the aggregate of loans closed. Senator CURTIS is right when he advises that the farmer has not secured the savings which he should as a result of the consolidated system, and the reason is that politicians are reaping the fruits which the farmer should harvest.

BEST OF SECURITY OFFERED

The American farmer offers the best security in the world for his loans. This same farmer is the pride of the world as an efficient producer. On our meadows are produced the largest crops of wheat, corn, rye, etc. In our pastures graze the world's champion cows, steers, and sheep.

Given a real farm loan system, and with the gigantic resources and intelligent experience which stands back of our agricultural industry, it would seem that the opportunities for securing capital at the lowest possible interest rates were excellent. Yet the farmer now, with this system in operation, pays a larger sum for his money than any other American business man, unless we wish to include those who depend upon pawnshops and usurious loan agencies in cities.

THE GRIP OF BIG BANKING

The reason is plain to those who have investigated the subject even in a casual manner. The functions of the Federal farm loan system are under the complete domination of New York banking houses. Within a stone's throw of Wall Street we may see the great, towering buildings which house the real headquarters of the Federal farm loan system. Here are the men who dictate who shall and who shall not act as farm loan commissioner, and here may be heard the "master's voice," which tells the officials what to and what not to do with respect to the intimate business of the system. Just as President Harding listened to and responded to the blanket list of names to be appointed as members of the farm loan bureau, so also had President Coolidge consistently played safe by naming only Wall Street's men to supervise, administer, and ruin the farmers' banking system.

EASY PICKINGS

Ex-Farm Loan Commissioner "Judge" Lobdell decided that he wished some easy pickings. It is of interest to note that prior to political pull transforming him from the plains of Kansas to a high office in Washington he received not to exceed one-fourth the annual salary that he later received as member of the Farm Loan Board. But this easy money did not long satisfy him; he soon had visions of greener pastures, where the grass was longer and the work not so irksome. Therefore, using the political functions of his alleged supervisory office, he sent out a call to the presidents of the 12 district Federal land banks to hie themselves down to Washington for the purpose of holding what has since become one of their popular "conferences," and at which much dirty work has been done contrary to the best interests of agriculture.

At this little session "Judge" Lobdell had himself appointed—before he was even out of the job of farm loan commissioner—to act as a fiscal agent of the 12 land banks. The salary to be $25,000 per year, or more than twice that he received as member of the board. Likewise handsome "expenses" were voted to him and his fiscal (pistol) agency.

$100,0000 PER YEAR PORK

Such brief statements of the workings of the fiscal agency as have since been permitted to make their way out into information reveal the fact that in excess of $100,000 per year has been contributed out of the farmer-owned land banks into the Lobdell agency. This money was expended, according to the statement, for propaganda and publicity purposes—one of the strangest facts being that more than $3,000 in a single year was contributed by the banks for publicity agency purposes alone in excess of what the same statement shows as expended, though through some tricky figure-recording system the total balance would indicate that all the money was expended for the purpose contributed by the land banks. This is but one of the several peculiar systems of bookkeeping adopted by Lobdell, which, we must remember, he originated also in the Farm Loan Board's affairs, and that he was chief originator of the plan whereby the board had a secret bank account in one of the Washington national banks, a record of which has never been made public nor the exact purpose of such fund ever explained.

LOBDELL GETS THE GATE

But poor Lobdell has got the gate. This will cause hundreds of honest and industrious officers of national farm loan associations to weep copious tears when they remember how Lobdell has treated every single man in the system who revealed the slightest intent of carrying out the high purposes of the farm loan act; how Lobdell sent his lackey, Dan J. Coughlin, around the country to blackjack every secretary-treasurer in carrying on what Coughlin was pleased to term an examination but which was more truly a persecution. It should be remembered that Coughlin is Lobdell's man Friday, imported along with his trunks from Kansas, and that Coughlin, under the guise of serving as a Federal examiner, has performed many dirty pieces of work for Lobdell and other members of the Farm Loan Board, the very recitation of which is so loud in odor as to cause a polecat to crawl under the barn for relief.

Poor, poor Lobdell! After farming the farmers for nearly 13 years—is 13 unlucky?—he is now obliged to get out and work. Let us hope that he gets an honest job, and that he will not feel under the necessity of carrying such tricky methods as he employed while a member of the Farm Loan Board.

But now poor Lobdell is out. But he should not be permitted to "get away with it," to employ a popular street phrase. He should forthwith be subpœnaed before the proper Senate committee and obliged to give, under oath, accounting of every cent that he has drawn from the 12 Federal land and intermediate credit bank treasuries, and to whom he paid, and for what purpose he paid the money. Lobdell has collected and expended in excess of $500,000 as official agent—he has never rendered a satisfactory account of this—although much had been boasted about holding an "examination" (by Farm Loan Board examiners—probably Coughlin did the trick), but this is only propaganda vaporizing which gets no one anywhere, much less Lobdell.

The investigation into the affairs as handled by Lobdell should date back to the time when he, as a member of the Farm Loan Board, so forgot the high duties and responsibilities of that office as to deduct certain commissions from receipts of farm loan bond sales and establish a secret and private account in the Franklin National Bank in Washington. Although this account was shown to have totaled more than $70,000, Lobdell gave a school-boy's excuse of an accounting of less than $50,000 of it, and that accounting was satisfactory to no one. Even Lobdell himself was uncertain about what and why he expended money.

One illegal phase of this bank account was revealed before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, namely, that Coughlin, while receiving compensation as an "examiner," going up and down the land doing Lobdell's dirty work, also received money from the secret account. Even Judas was paid only from one treasury!

THE SAME OLD BUNK FLOWS FREELY

Despite the fact that certain members of the conservatives among Republican administration circles would have us believe that the Federal farm loan system is ideal and that Utopia was reached when certain members of the board had the "can tied to them," when President Coolidge "fired them," and replaced them with Meyer's crew, this is far from the fact.

The truth is that the entire system is now so near bankruptcy that illegal practices have been resorted to in order to pump enough life into the system to keep it from passing out as the result of political manipulation on the part of inexperienced and dishonest officials.

Men, mostly on Meyer's pay roll, travel up and down the land and proclaim to anyone who will listen, and such unsuspecting parties as may be near, that Meyer is the most wonderful banker in the world; that he would and could receive $100,000 a year in a private bank; that Meyer is making a great sacrifice to stay on as farm loan commissioner.

The acid test of horse sense reveals this as plain bunk. If Meyer were the greatest banker in the world, Meyer would be in a bank; if Meyer could secure so easily $100,000 a year in a private bank, that is exactly where Meyer would now repose, as for months past. And what obligation does Meyer feel that he is under to the farmer or the country that he should make any sacrifice? These simple propositions blast such childish propaganda as is now employed to reveal Meyer as great, as king of Utopia.

Meyer, remember, made such a failure of the old War Finance Corporation that Congress was obliged to foot losses running into the millions. If Meyer stays on much longer as dominator and dictator of the farm loan system, Congress will need to authorize still another big dip into that fund that Mellon guards so carefully—when prohibition is talked—but expends so freely when tax refunds are being made to wealthy corporations (that contributed freely to the Republican Campaign funds).

TURN THE BANKS OVER TO OWNERS

If Meyer and Mellon were anywhere near so great as they would have an unsuspecting world believe, long since they would have taken a definite move to turn the 12 Federal land banks over to their rightful owners, the farmers, who were legally forced to subscribe to the capitalization and assume all the liabilities of same. They would, not for a split second wish anyone save the rightful owners to manage these banks; they would not desire that partisan politics dictate entirely, as now, in the supervision and the administration of these banks.

Meyer does not know where else to get work, so Meyer is farm loan commissioner. That's the plain, unbiased truth, and don't let the nigger in any woodpile fool you.

REDUCED FARM LOANS NOW MADE

Now, as for many months past, fewer and fewer farm loans are being made. In hundreds of counties four to five farms are having the Federal farm loan mortgage foreclosed against them by Federal land banks to every loan that is being made. If Meyer is such a wonderful banker, and if he is so good in administrative work and in selection of officers to pluck the land bank business, why is this the case?

Back in 1927 the administration prevented farmers from obtaining $90,000,000 to lend at a low rate. All farmers received that year was $62,000,000, as compared with $157,000,000 in 1926, the smallest since 1922.

During the period of the war the Treasury purchased—to keep them off the market and out of the way of Liberty bond sales, and not because farm loan bonds could not be advantageously sold—$100,000,000 of farm loan bonds.

In 1927 some one, disregarding agriculture's dire need, advised the Treasury to sell that $100,000,000 of farm loan bonds. Under counsel, the Federal land banks did not issue nor endeavor to sell new bond issues that would conflict with Treasury sales, proceeds of which went into the Public Treasury. That meant there were $90,000,000 less to lend to the farmers. Depression reigned supreme throughout the land; only one who urgently needed, was worthy, and had the security to offer, received a loan to the 10 or 12 who applied for loans.

Who was the smart Alec who advised this procedure? Was his name Mellon, Meyer, or Lobdell? Whoever he was, he was a Judas to American agriculture, which means to all American interests. The fact that he was shortsighted means little; the fact that, under the present political system, one man, or a few men, are thus able to jeopardize the interests of all farmers, clearly demonstrates that we need a change in method of operation and dictation of the affairs of the Federal farm loan system.

Had the system been, as it should be, in the hands of farmer-directors of the 12 district Federal land banks, it is unthinkable that any farmer—bright enough to go under cover when it rains—would have permitted any such policy of the Treasury dumping bonds onto a market and ruining the sale of bonds required to finance farming. What did the political manipulators of the land banks care about farmers? They got theirs, anyhow!

WHAT WILL HOOVER DO?

As a political campaigner, Herbert Hoover had much to say about bureaucracies, and what he thought of them parallels human experience and represents a characterization of the story of the Farm Loan Bureau.

Hoover has made a solemn promise to the American people. Can he defend the actions of this board during the two previous administrations? Can he now permit petty politicans to manipulate a billion and a half dollar enterprise—one of the greatest banking institutions in the world—to the exclusion of the people this system was created to serve, and whose industry it should sustain and foster?

Although Eugene Meyer has already had his propagander write a nice little story about how he "quietly cleaned up the farm loan system," same appearing in the papers in time for the returned tourist to read upon his return from South America! If Herbent Hoover can keep Meyer in the job he now occupies more than 15 minutes after he takes up the business of President, then it will clearly indicate that his promises are not fulfilled. One of the first bureaus that requires a "dry cleaning" is the Farm Loan Bureau. Men who are at least acquainted with farming should be given the task of supervising, the management of the banks should be placed in the hands of the farmers, and the whole system operated as intended—as an American—not a Russianized banking system.

WHO WILL PAY THE LOSSES?

During the more than five years that the politicians have been manipulating the farmer-owned land banking system, the banks have sustained losses which range into the millions. Most of these losses may be charged to mismanagement and crookedness on the part of the officers. The United States Government made a payment to the American railroads, after politicians had nearly wrecked them during the war; the Congress should provide, in a similar manner, for repayment to the farmers who have been pillaged by as dishonest a lot of officeholders. If the politicians are to run the people's business, then the Government should stand the bill—not the farmers.

A committee should be named for the specific purpose of carrying on an intensive and thorough investigation of the Federal farm loan system; an accounting of the losses should be listed and Congress authorized repayment to the farmers of this sum. Then they should quickly kick out of office the political plunderers and put in their stead honest, intelligent, experienced farm representatives, of which there is an abundant number now ready to take over the land banks.

NEW JERSEY PLANS TO REPLACE OLD MORTGAGE LAWS WITH NEW ONES—COMMISSION HAS NUMBER OF RECOMMENDATIONS FOR CORRECTING THE ARCHAIC CONDITION

The mortgage laws revision commission of the State of New Jersey will submit to the 1929 session of the legislature a number of measures for enactment, according to Atwood C. Wolf, secretary. "These are practically all devised to afford temporary relief from existing conditions pending a final and complete revision and recodification of all real estate mortgage laws—statutes and decisions, which to-day are considered archaic and cumbersome, the legacies of the old common law of the State," says Mr. Wolf in a statement on the work of the commission.

"The greatest evil, delay in the foreclosure of mortgages in default, has long been considered as a most deterrent influence."

SHERIFF GETS A BIG COMMISSION

Nor has this delay of six to nine months for foreclosure been the only matter considered for immediate relief. Sheriff's costs for crying off the sale have always been considered as most excessive, and more frequently than not those costs have had to come out of the mortgage principal, obviously at the expense of the investor. Heretofore sheriff's fees have been assessed at 2½ per cent on the first $5,000 and 2 per cent on all above that sum. This for a mere administrative act.

NOT MORE THAN $50 FOR SHERIFF

The members of the commission all felt, after holding a series of open hearings, that these fees were highly excessive and that the county and State should not be the chief beneficiaries at the expense of the unfortunate property owner.

WILL PUT BRAKE ON TRICKY LAWYERS

Some 23 specific items have been so far considered. These include practically every question that will tend to improve and modernize the mortgage law situation, such as a statutory short form of mortgage, photostatic recording processes, elimination of all redemption periods, decentralization of courts having jurisdiction in foreclosures, substitution of a flat-fee system for the ancient and archaic costs and allowance method, revisions of counsel fees, the method of service upon absent or nonresident defendants, and many others.

The mortgage laws commission, although it may not complete its work for two or three years, has already accomplished a great deal. The six members have been chosen from various parts of the State of New Jersey and all are experienced lawyers or brokers.

Communications or inquiries should be addressed to either the secretary, Counselor Atwood C. Wolf, Jersey City, or to the chairman, Edward West, at Camden. Suggestions or constructive criticisms will be welcomed, Mr. Wolf said.

The other members of the commission are William J. Egan, Newark; Alfred S. March, New Brunswick; John E. Siracusa, Atlantic City; and William J. Blair, Asbury Park.

CLARA PERCY

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3453) to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of Clara Percy, which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $5,000, to Clara Percy, on account of the death of her husband, Elmer Charles Percy, who was struck and fatally injured by a United States Government truck in Balboa, Canal Zone.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act for the relief of Clara Percy."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12236) to provide an appropriation for the payment of claims of persons who suffered property damage, death, or personal injury due to the explosion of the naval ammunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. J., July 10, 1926.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14800) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers, sailors, and marines of said war; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD, Mr. ELLIOTT, and Mr. GREENWOOD were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

BOULDER DAM

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], who is unable to be here to-day, recently gave out a short interview to a newspaper man from the West relating to Boulder Dam legislation. I think it would be of great interest to the Members of the Senate, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The rumors that are floating around to the effect that Arizona will not ratify the Boulder Dam legislation are simply an hysterical expression of either fear or hope and have no foundation in fact. I have not the slightest doubt that Arizona's Legislature, which is now in session, will authorize the execution of the tri-State agreement authorized by Congress in the fourth section of the Boulder Dam act.

I am frank to say that this opinion is not based upon any private information within my possession, but is, in my opinion, supported by the logic of the situation.

The act is materially different from the bill opposed in the past and opposed at the last preceding session of Congress by the Arizona Senators and Congressmen and the Arizona commission. I must confess that even those who are in sympathy with the demands of Arizona—and I was one of them—have been astonished at the great concessions that were obtained by the Arizona Senators in the Senate and subsequently approved by the House of Representatives.

Arizona demanded some form of compensation in lieu of taxation that might be lost if the United States Government constructed the dam and power house instead of private capital. Nevada joined in this demand, and I had the honor to introduce the amendments which provided for such compensation. The compensation is to come out of any annual surplus that may arise over and above the amount annually due the Government for amortization. The fact that $25,000,000 of Government money is to be paid back out of the 62½ per cent of such surplus warrants me in believing that there will be a substantial annual surplus. It is estimated that the States of Arizona and Nevada will each receive between $400,000 and $600,000 annually by virtue of such provision.

It is possible, if not probable, that in the event others than the United States Government build the power house such power house will be subject to regular and uniform tax assessments of Arizona and Nevada. This compensation, in such case, will be in addition to the compensation above referred to.

Arizona and California each demanded 4,600,000 acre-feet of water. By the act California is restrained from taking out of the Colorado River in excess of 4,400,000 acre-feet of water. This will leave 3,800,000 acre-feet out of the main stream subject to perpetual use by Arizona, which, together with the reserved waters of her tributaries, will give her more water than she originally demanded.

The Congress of the United States has authorized a tri-State agreement between Arizona, California, and Nevada which will absolutely protect Arizona in exclusive beneficial use of the waters of the Gila River and its tributaries, and protects forever the waters of the Gila River and its tributaries from any diminution whatever by allowance of water which would be made by treaty or otherwise to the United States of Mexico.

It appears therefore that Arizona has substantially obtained from Congress its material demands, and there would appear to be no legitimate excuse to further oppose the legislation. In fact, it is reasonable to believe that, in the circumstances, if Arizona still, after all these concessions, attempts to prevent the construction of these necessary works, she will be defeated in such opposition by the ratification of a 6-State agreement in which Utah will participate.

Utah undoubtedly should be satisfied. Every amendment to the bill offered by the Senators from Utah while the bill was pending in the Senate at this session was adopted and is now a part of the act. These concessions were made to Utah upon the understanding that if such amendments were agreed to the bill would be satisfactory to the State of Utah.

In such event the act would be ratified anyway after six months; but the residents of all the seven interested States, most of whom have been sympathetic with Arizona, believe that Arizona has won its fight and are anxious for it to join with the rest of them in the ratification of the 7-State agreement and the pending act.

The legislators of Arizona will realize that all legislation is a compromise and that their State has been remarkably successful in the matter of congressional compromise. Their Senators and Congressmen and their former governor and their commission are to be congratulated upon the splendid fight they made and the success of their efforts.

The Legislature of Nevada will undoubtedly in a few days authorize the execution of the tri-State agreement provided for in section 4 of the act. This action will undoubtedly be followed by similar action by California. The matter will then be up to Arizona, and I am satisfied that the generous spirit of its legislators and their intelligence will justify them in following the same course without delay.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

Mr. JONES. Under the head of further morning business, pursuant to notice that I gave on Saturday last, I desire to make a motion. It is written out in the form of a resolution, but, as a matter of fact, it is a motion to amend a paragraph of the rules. I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 309) submitted by Mr. JONES on January 26, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XXXVIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to proceedings on nominations in executive session, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding an additional paragraph, as follows:

"7. Hereafter nominations shall be considered in open executive session unless the Senate, in closed executive session, shall by a two-thirds vote determine that any particular nomination shall be considered in closed executive session, and in that case paragraph 2 of of this rule shall apply to such nomination and its consideration."

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, pursuant to the rules, this is a motion which may be considered without going to a committee. I am going to ask that it may lie on the table, and I expect to call it up at the next meeting of the Senate when we have a morning hour. Then, probably, the question will be raised as to whether it should go to the Rules Committee, but that question may be considered at that time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, with that statement I have no objection at all, but I do think that an amendment to amend the rules so important as this would be if adopted should go to the Rules Committee for report.

Mr. JONES. I wish to say to the Senator that I am inclined to think that practically every Senator has his mind made up with reference to a matter of this kind, but, as I have stated, I am not asking action on the motion this morning. However, when we next have a morning hour, I shall ask for such action. Of course, if a majority of the Senate deems it wise and proper, I recognize that this motion can be referred to the Committee on Rules by a majority vote of the Senate. So I merely give this notice in order that every Senator may make up his mind in the meantime as to whether or not to send the motion to the Committee on Rules or vote on it directly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will call his motion up at a very early day.

Mr. JONES. I shall do so the first time we have a morning hour in the Senate.

Mr. DILL. I hope the motion will not go to the Rules Committee of the Senate, because if it does we shall never hear of it again.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the Senator's opinion.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I very much hope the Senate will adopt the motion of the Senator from Washington, because I want to relieve some Senator of the necessity of violating his oath every time we have an executive session. Of course, there is no secrecy about executive sessions. There is somebody here who runs out and makes a full report, either in order that he may have an advantage or to put somebody else at a disadvantage, and only half the truth is told. While I do not presume it hurts the conscience of whoever does it, I want to relieve him of the necessity of having to do it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I take it that the resolution or motion will be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. JONES. I desire to have it printed, so that every Senator may examine it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. FLETCHER. I renew my request for unanimous consent to consider the bridge bills on the calendar. I know that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] is anxious to get up the joint resolution in which he is interested, and I am with him in connection with that measure, but I think these bridge bills ought to be disposed of, because there are some of them which must be sent over to the House. It will only take a minute to consider them.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if they are only bridge bills in the regular form and no discussion will take place on them, I hope that unanimous consent will be given.

Mr. FLETCHER. There will be no discussion at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have no intention of objecting. I simply wish to state at this time, in accordance with notice heretofore given, that when the calendar is called in the ordinary way if there is objection to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 117 I shall move to take it up. I am not objecting, however, to the request of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The request of the Senator from Florida would begin with Calendar No. 1538 and extend to Calendar 1559, as I understand.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania is correct if consent be given to the consideration of the bills referred to by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I should like to ask what objection there is to going on with the calendar and let the bills referred to by the Senator from Florida come up in their regular order? I do not know whether they are going to involve any discussion or not. There are Senators here who have some very important bills on the calendar, and the bills referred to by the Senator from Florida may take up the morning hour.

Mr. FLETCHER. It will only take a few moments to consider them. There is no objection to them, they are in the regular form, and have been reported by the Commerce Committee.

Mr. BLEASE. I do not see that a bridge bill is any more important than any other bill, and I object.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well; when we consider the calendar we may find some other bill taken up which will consume the morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is concluded. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 785, being the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal. I make this request because on Saturday we completed the calendar; and, in view of the fact that objection has been made to the consideration of all the bills on the calendar preceding Senate Joint Resolution 117—and they have been passed over many times—I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. DILL. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 117.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as I understand, that motion is not now in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will not be in order until the joint resolution is reached on the calendar and objection is made at that time.

PROHIBITION OF WAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The call of the calendar will proceed.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting war was announced as first in order.

Mr. BRUCE. I move that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Maryland will not make that motion.

Mr. BRUCE. I most assuredly will. It draws no distinction whatever as between wars, whether for self-defense or otherwise.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I was going to ask that the joint resolution go over, but I see that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], who introduced it, is now present.

Mr. BRUCE. It is nothing but a sickly moonbeam, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does not an objection put the joint resolution over under the rule? I do not care to take it up; I am not in favor of the joint resolution; but I hope the Senator from Maryland will not make his motion. I should like to have the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to postpone indefinitely should follow a motion adopted by the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BRUCE. The joint resolution has come up on the call of the calendar time and time again, but no effort has been made to discuss it or to secure its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The only motion in order at the present time is a motion to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, and then, if that motion should be carried, a motion to indefinitely postpone the joint resolution would be in order.

Mr. BRUCE. If the Senator from North Dakota will promise to take up the joint resolution and explain it and make some effort to secure its enactment, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am not prepared to make the motion to take up the resolution at this time, but I will be glad to have it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the joint resolution will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 57) requesting the President to immediately withdraw the armed forces of the United States from Nicaragua was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. I move that the joint resolution be taken up for consideration, with a view to moving its indefinite postponement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, that joint resolution will consume a good deal of time if it is taken up now. I am willing to have it go over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Maryland is not debatable.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood the Senator from Maryland to say that his idea was to move to postpone the measure indefinitely.

Mr. BRUCE. It is.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then there is no need to take it up.

Mr. NORRIS. I make the point of order that the motion to postpone indefinitely is not in order under this call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order until the Senate has voted to take up the joint resolution.

Mr. BRUCE. I moved that the measure be taken up for consideration with a view to making a motion to postpone it indefinitely.

Mr. HEFLIN. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 57.

The motion was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

PROPOSED NICARAGUAN CANAL

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal was announced as next in order.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Interoceanic Canals with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the President is hereby authorized to cause to be made, under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, a full and complete investigation and survey for the purpose of revising and bringing down to date the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission transmitted to the Congress December 4, 1901, and for the purpose of collecting the additional information and data necessary in order to ascertain (1) the most practicable route for an interoceanic ship canal by way of the San Juan River and Great Lake of Nicaragua or by way of any route over Nicaraguan territory, including a suitable harbor at each of the termini thereof; (2) the feasibility and approximate cost of the construction and maintenance of such canal; and (3) the cost of acquiring all private rights, privileges, and franchises, if any, pertaining to such route. The investigation and survey shall be made upon the basis of a canal having a capacity sufficient for the convenient passage of vessels of such tonnage and draft as may reasonably be anticipated.

SEC. 2. The Chief of Engineers, under the direction of the Secretary of War, shall establish and maintain during the investigation and survey thereafter such stations as he deems necessary for gauging the water supply available for the operation of the canal.

SEC. 3. The Chief of Engineers, under the direction of the Secretary of War, shall also make an engineering survey and an investigation for the purpose of determining the possibilities and cost of enlarging the Panama Canal to the extent which may be necessary to meet the future needs of interoceanic shipping.

SEC. 4. The Government of Nicaragua having by treaty with the Government of the United States, signed at Washington on August 5, 1914, and duly ratified as required by the laws of both of said Governments and proclaimed June 24, 1916, granted in perpetuity to the Government of the United States, forever free from taxation or other public charge, the exclusive proprietary rights necessary and convenient for the construction, operation, and maintenance of an interoceanic canal, by way of the San Juan River and the Great Lake of Nicaragua, or by way of any route over Nicaraguan territory, the details of the terms upon which such canal shall be constructed, operated, and maintained to be agreed to by the two Governments.

The President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to enter into negotiations for an agreement upon the details of the terms under which such canal may be constructed, operated, and maintained: Provided, That nothing contained in this resolution shall be construed to bind the United States to build said Nicaraguan canal.

SEC. 5. The Senate of the United States having incorporated in its esolution advising and consenting to ratification of the treaty with Nicaragua, as aforesaid, a declaration "that in advising and consenting to the ratification of the said convention as amended such advice and consent are given with the understanding, to be expressed as a part of the instrument of ratification, that nothing in said convention is intended to affect any existing right of any of the said named States," namely, Costa Rica, Salvador, and Honduras, the President is authorized and empowered to enter into negotiations with said States and determine whether they, or any of them, have any interest in said proposed canal.

SEC. 6. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $150,000, to be expended by the Secretary of War for the purposes of this resolution and to remain available until expended; and there are hereby authorized to be appropriated such additional sums as may be necessary for such purposes.

SEC. 7. The President is requested to report to the Congress as soon as practicable, not later than two years, the results of the investigation and survey, together with such recommendations in connection therewith as he deems advisable.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I shall speak very briefly to the resolution, from the simple fact that on previous occasions I have explained it, and I believe its object is familiar to every Member of the Senate.

However, as the joint resolution is now officially before the Senate, permit me again to assure Senators that the measure in no way, shape, form, or manner commits the Senate to any future interoceanic canal policy. It simply provides for securing such information as it is absolutely necessary and essential for the Senate and the Congress to have before they can determine upon a future policy.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. DILL. If this joint resolution is passed, how many employees will be required to carry out its purpose?

Mr. EDGE. The joint resolution provides that the Engineering Department of the War Department shall make the surveys necessary to determine the cost and possibility of suggested improvements to the Panama Canal, and at the same time make a similar survey as to the proposal to build a Nicaraguan canal over the route where we have paid $3,000,000 for the right of way.

As to the number of employees necessary, that would be a matter of detail in the Engineering Corps of the War Department. They naturally, in the ordinary way, would send a staff of engineers to the Nicaraguan route, or from Panama to the Nicaraguan route—engineers already being in Panama—to secure the information required under the terms of the joint resolution.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think it will require any additional employees?

Mr. McKELLAR. If it does, I call attention to the fact that $150,000 is appropriated in the joint resolution, and it is limited to that amount.

Mr. EDGE. The joint resolution does not provide for the employment of anyone now outside of the service; and, as the Senator from Tennessee has stated, the limit of money to be expended under the terms of the joint resolution is $150,000 and the time limit for securing the information is two years.

Mr. DILL. How was this amount of $150,000 arrived at?

Mr. EDGE. It was arrived at through an estimate made by the War Department.

Mr. DILL. How much of it is to be spent on the Panama Canal and how much of it on the Nicaraguan route?

Mr. EDGE. There has been absolutely no attempt to make that division. That is a technical engineering matter which must be left to the War Department. The total amount estimated for was budgeted by the Budget officers and approved by the President of the United States.

Mr. DILL. Has this joint resolution passed the House?

Mr. EDGE. The joint resolution has not been considered in the House. One of the reasons why I want to have it considered in the Senate as early as possible is so that it can have consideration in the House.

Mr. DILL. The Senator does not think the joint resolution will pass the House at this session, does he?

Mr. EDGE. I am concerned with its consideration and disposition by the Senate, at least so as to give sufficient time in the House for its further consideration there.

Mr. DILL. Will the Senator answer another question? How nearly are we using the facilities of the Panama Canal at this time?

Mr. EDGE. The Governor of the Panama Canal in his last report—the report up to June 30, 1928—stated that the use of the Panama Canal had now reached 50 per cent of its facilities. The business through the Panama Canal which I set forth in an address I made to the Senate several weeks ago has more than doubled each 5 years of the 15 years the canal has been open to traffic. No one anticipates that the same proportion will continue after the third cycle of five years; but it has continued for the three 5-year periods through which we have passed. But, even if it continues in a considerably reduced proportion, it is estimated by the Governor of the Canal Zone and by engineers that we will have reached the limit of the present mechanical facilities within from 12 to 20 years. It is also estimated by engineers that it will require approximately that time to construct a new canal, and a considerable portion of that time to install a third set of locks, which has been proposed, at the Panama Canal.

Again, from the time necessary for construction must be deducted the years necessary for surveys, which is all this joint resolution calls for. The longer we put off the surveys, the nearer will we come to the time when we will reach the maximum capacity of the canal.

Mr. DILL. When was the last survey made?

Mr. EDGE. The last survey made of the proposed Nicaraguan canal was contained in the report transmitted to the President and Congress in 1901, 27 years ago.

Mr. DILL. What additional information is necessary now that was not given in that survey?

Mr. EDGE. From an engineering standpoint, I am informed—and it sounds very reasonable to me—that the method of construction has to a great extent changed during a period of 27 years. While it is reasonable to assume that the topography of the country of Nicaragua has not greatly changed in that time, unless through earthquake or volcanic eruption, methods of constructing canals has undergone considerable change. There has been much agitation in recent years of the feasibility of a sea-level canal. Of course that was more or less investigated during the period when the Isthmian Canal Commission made the survey in Nicaragua some 27 years ago; but it is reasonable to assume that with the great development in construction work, the Senate, the Congress, and the country would not be satisfied to proceed to a decision in so important a matter upon a survey made 27 years ago. Further than that, if I may answer the Senator's question a little further, if he wants information—and I am sure he does——

Mr. DILL. I do.

Mr. EDGE. The route of the canal proposed through Nicaragua has never been definitely established. Our right-of-way privilege permits us to follow any route through the country that would seem best adapted, not necessarily the route which was suggested in the Isthmian Canal Commission's report. There have been some suggestions that a different route might be followed in some sections of the distance the canal must traverse, and perhaps thus lessen the expense. So all of that makes absolutely compulsory, if we are to act intelligently, a further survey of the Nicaraguan canal route.

Mr. DILL. How much can the facilities of the Panama Canal be enlarged?

Mr. EDGE. That, again, is a matter that the new Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, Colonel Burgess, in personal conference with him during the holiday, has suggested the engineers be given power to ascertain.

Mr. DILL. That is what I can not understand about this legislation—why, when we have not yet determined the additional facilities possible at Panama, we should be asked to enter upon preparations for the building of a Nicaraguan canal. It is admitted that only 50 per cent of the facilities of the Panama Canal are now being used, that they can be enlarged, and yet we are asked here to combine an investigation as to the enlargement of the Panama Canal with getting the necessary data for the building of a new canal.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I think I can answer that in a very few moments.

We are faced, obviously, with the necessity of increasing canal facilities. We have two proposals, both very general. One of them is to install a third set of locks in the Panama Canal. As I understand, that is a mechanical suggestion that has never been tried, a mechanical suggestion that would require considerable study and investigation on the part of the engineers, both as to cost and available water supply. At the same time we have possessed for 14 years a right of way across Nicaragua for a second interoceanic canal. We paid $3,000,000 for that right of way. We have never acted upon it. Now, I repeat, when we are faced with the necessity of increasing canal facilities, it would seem to be a matter of ordinary good common sense and business judgment to investigate both possibilities to bring about that increase and not merely to investigate one and be unable to tell Congress what could be done with the other, especially in view of the fact that we have already made the investment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. What is the estimated cost of the Nicaraguan canal?

Mr. EDGE. That is purely a guess. The cost of a Nicaraguan canal as given by the Isthmian Canal Commission 27 years ago, as I recall, was something under $200,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Seventy million dollars.

Mr. EDGE. At the same time the estimated cost of completing the Panama Canal—for Senators will recall that it had already been undertaken by the French—was considerably more than that. In other words, if we can base the cost to-day on the cost 27 years ago, it would have cost less to construct the Nicaraguan canal at that time than it did to complete the Panama Canal. How much it will cost in addition because of the recognized increase in the cost of construction——

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. EDGE. As soon as I finish my sentence. How much additional it will cost because of the well-known increase in the cost of construction I am unable to tell the Senator. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. My own predisposition has been, as apparently has been that of the Senator from Washington, to enlarge the Panama Canal. I went through that canal last year, and after a discussion of the matter with the officials it seemed to me that it would be possible to enlarge the facilities materially. The water is there, and all that is necessary might be done. But this proposal of the Senator from New Jersey is to have a survey, to find out how feasible and practicable and economical would be the building of a canal through Nicaragua. It would seem to me, as I view it, that it would be very wise for the Senate to have this information in order that the matter then might be settled on its merits when we come to consider the question of increased canal facilities, whether we would decide that we should enlarge the canal at Panama or build this in preference. For that reason I have been inclined to support the proposal of the Senator from New Jersey to have this survey made.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Washington asked about the cost of the proposed canal, and my answer might probably mislead him. The lowest limit of cost, as fixed in the report at the time referred to, 27 years ago, was seventy millions, and the highest was one hundred and forty millions. Of course, it would take more now.

Mr. DILL. What did the Panama Canal cost?

Mr. McKELLAR. It cost $370,000,000.

Mr. DILL. Why did they spend $370,000,000 if they could have built a canal through Nicaragua for $70,000,000?

Mr. McKELLAR. We all remember, or have read, at any rate, that there was a great fight over a choice between these two routes. The Panama Canal indisputably cost a great deal more than it would have cost to build a canal in Nicaragua.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, supplementing what the Senator from New York has just stated, my mind is entirely open as to the advisability of enlarging the Panama Canal or building the Nicaraguan canal, or both; but I contend that it is impossible for the Senate intelligently to decide either of those questions until they have the information. To me it is inconceivable that anyone should object to securing information.

Mr. DILL. But this resolution does not provide how much is to be spent on studying the conditions in Panama and how much on studying the conditions in Nicaragua. We are to appropriate a lump sum, $150,000, for the engineers and let them spend it as they see fit, with no assurance that we will get the information.

Mr. EDGE. It directs the engineers to get the information with respect to both projects. For us arbitrarily to say that $50,000 should be spent at one place and $100,000 in another would seem to me a very unusual procedure.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think we are in such dire need of another canal across the Central American part of the continent that we should go ahead with preparations to build such a canal with conditions on our inland waterways as they are?

Mr. EDGE. The two are very intimately related, but that one is dependent upon the other I do not think is true. The Senator uses the words "dire need." I do think it is essential that we should receive this information, and the sooner the better. As far as the inland waterways are concerned, I have just as much interest in the development of the inland waterways as the Senator from Washington, or any Senator from his section of the country, or any other section of the country. But does it not occur to the Senator that if the Mississippi River improvements continue to be made, and the inland waterways up through that northwestern section have that much more traffic carried over them, we should in time build the Nicaraguan canal, so that the people of the Northwest would have open to them through the Gulf of Mexico a new market at certainly lower transportation costs than via a coast route? As a matter of providing a feeder or output from the great Northwest, from a purely selfish standpoint they should be in favor of a Nicaraguan canal.

Mr. DILL. As soon as this canal was built tolls would be charged on it, and it would not be of any value to us. So I do not see any reason for building another canal.

Mr. EDGE. Of course the question of tolls would be a matter for Congress to decide. We have taken no advantage of our right to fix tolls on the Panama Canal, and the tolls are the same to all. Over $20,000,000 collected in tolls last year netted an interest of 7½ per cent to the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. DILL. All at the expense of the commerce of the part of the country that sends traffic through the canal.

Mr. HAWES and Mr. WHEELER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. EDGE. I think the Senator from Missouri first rose.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I am rather interested in the fact that there is no provision in the bill for the employment of civilian engineers, but that the framers of the legislation have placed this survey entirely in the hands of the Chief of Army Engineers. We have in the United States over 200,000 civilian engineers. They have a great national organization of 20,000 members of high ethical standards and great experience. Each of our State colleges is graduating civilian engineers each year. In the original work on the Panama Canal, if I am not mistaken, civilian engineers were called in with the Army engineers. In the original draft of this bill I notice that a board of engineers was provided for. I would like to know why civilian engineers are to be eliminated in making this survey.

Mr. EDGE. I direct the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the original resolution to which he refers, simply recites that the sundry civil bill of March 2, 1895, made provision for the work being under the direction of the Board of Engineers. So far as the proposal before the Senate is concerned, it has always been provided that the Army engineers should furnish the information. In that connection, I am sure the Senator will be interested in a letter I have received from the very organization of which I assume he speaks, the American Engineering Council. The letter is from their Washington office, 26 Jackson Place, is addressed to me, and reads:

AMERICAN ENGINEERING COUNCIL,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1929.

Hon. WALTER E. EDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR EDGE: I am glad to advise you that American Engineering Council has indorsed Senate Resolution 117, authorizing an investigation and survey for the Nicaraguan canal. I refer to your resolution now pending before the Senate.

You may make such use of this indorsement as in your judgment will aid you in accomplishing the purpose you have in mind. If there is any way in which we can be of direct assistance, please feel free to command us.

Sincerely yours,

L. W. WALLACE,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. HAWES. I will say to the Senator that in the flood-control work the Chief of Army Engineers and the Army engineers do not seem to want the cooperation or assistance of civilian engineers, and in a matter of this magnitude, a project of such great interest, I am sure the American people would be better satisfied if somewhere the President were given authority to place some civilian engineers on this work, cooperating with the Army engineers.

I can not quite understand the situation. We train our lawyers in this country and we use them in public service. We use them as district attorneys and judges. We train our doctors and we use them in the Health Service and we use them in the Army. We have painters who can paint the Capitol dome. But nowhere is the civilian engineer permitted by the Army engineer to cooperate in any of these projects. He is eliminated. He is the one scientific man in America who is eliminated from public service.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, there may be, and undoubtedly is, a great deal in what the Senator contends; but we have not eliminated the private engineer. We have provided an appropriation of $150,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the purpose of ascertaining the facts and making a survey, and he may expend the money in any manner he sees fit, proper, and wise. So that under this resolution the Secretary of War unquestionably could employ the services of a consulting or of any other type of engineer.

Mr. HAWES. Would the Senator object to an amendment which would provide that a portion of this board should consist of civilian engineers?

Mr. EDGE. I would, Mr. President, for the reason that I want this survey to cost the Government as little as possible. I communicated with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. We first provided, I think, $250,000. They investigated further, and later came to the committee saying that they felt that $150,000 would be sufficient to enable them to secure the information the committee desired. In view of the terms of their budget recommendation I do not feel that we should enlarge the cost to the Government.

Mr. HAWES. Was the Chief of Engineers consulted in the preparation of this resolution?

Mr. EDGE. Not by me, but I have no doubt he was consulted; he naturally would be as the head of that division of the War Department. I may say to the Senator that I have discussed with the Chief of Engineers the feasibility of this resolution and he is very enthusiastic to undertake it.

Mr. HAWES. I will say to the Senator that I am sympathetic with the program, but I am entirely opposed to the adoption of this resolution when this great army of civilian engineers is barred from public service.

Mr. EDGE. Why does the Senator take the position that they would be barred from public service?

Mr. HAWES. Because of the experience we have had in such matters in the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. EDGE. They are not legally barred, as far as the terms of this resolution are concerned.

Mr. HAWES. Why can we not write in the resolution a provision that civilian engineers shall be represented, so that there will be no doubt about it? I am sure that would satisfy the American people better.

Mr. EDGE. I have no deep-seated objection to that, except that I felt that the resolution in its present form would provide that opportunity without making it mandatory.

Mr. HAWES. It does seem a little strange, when the Senator's State and my State are issuing diplomas to engineers, and those engineers are receiving high positions in private concerns, and in the construction of private works, why they should be eliminated in a pioneering investigation of this kind.

Mr. EDGE. I take exception to the word "eliminated." They are not eliminated under the terms of the joint resolution.

Mr. HAWES. Mark my prediction, under its terms they will be eliminated. Civilian engineers were employed on the Panama Canal, in the original work.

Mr. EDGE. That is quite true, but does the Senator recall whether any legislation made it mandatory that civilian engineers should be employed?

Mr. HAWES. No; but this would place the whole matter in the hands of the Chief of Engineers. We know that the Chief of Engineers would not put on that board a civilian engineer if he could possibly avoid it.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator will prepare an amendment I will consider it.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I was just going to ask the Senator this question, Whether the Army has not plenty of engineers, so that they could do the work without employing any outside engineers?

Mr. EDGE. I do not doubt that in the slightest degree. I assume they have an ample force to do this work, because they have made no suggestion of any kind to the effect that they were not prepared to carry out the direction of the resolution.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Are there any treaty or other provisions for the neutralization of the Panama Canal in time of war?

Mr. EDGE. The Panama Canal?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes. I do not know that there are, and in that event might not a sea-level canal through Nicaragua be of the very greatest degree of value as an alternative in time of war in case the Panama Canal were seized by a hostile force?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I dwelt on that point at considerable length several weeks ago. I think it is a most important safety insurance, one might say, for the Government to have two interoceanic canals. But I will say further that as far as this resolution is concerned we do not attempt a decision as to that.

Mr. BRUCE. I did not know whether the Senator had taken up that topic.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Maryland just a moment, the Senator is entirely right about that. As we all know, the Panama Canal was built under what is known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which corrected or modified the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1852. In this matter, if the Nicaragua Canal is built, it is not bound in any way by any treaty obligations or complications of any kind.

ELECTRIC-CURRENT RATES IN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a few days ago, I think last Saturday, I made some remarks called forth by an article in Barron's Financial Weekly, and in that address I made some comparisons in accordance with a suggestion in that article. Since I spoke the other day I have obtained some additional figures, which I think ought to be added to what I presented at that time.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I, of course, have no means of knowing, but I had some impression from discussions with Senators who have not been entirely friendly to the proposed Nicaragua Canal legislation that they were only going to speak very briefly and would permit a vote before 2 o'clock. I am just wondering, if that is true, whether it is not possible to have that matter disposed of, now that we have had half an hour or more of discussion, and if we may have a vote on it before 2 o'clock?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not going to take the time until 2 o'clock, I will assure the Senator.

A comparison that fits in exactly, it seems to me, with those which I made the other day comes from Jamestown, N. Y. Jamestown has a municipally owned electrict-light plant which has been in operation about 34 years. It is claimed in the article from which I expect to quote that they are giving to the people of Jamestown the cheapest electric-light rates that are given to any municipality in the State of New York.

I want to read from an article in the November, 1928, issue of a magazine called Public Ownership, written by Mr. Samuel A. Carlson, who is a former mayor of Jamestown, N. Y., and president of the New York State Conference of Mayors. After giving some history in regard to the origin of the municipal plant at Jamestown and stating that it has been in operation for 34 years, he said:

> Current was then sold for domestic purposes and commercial purposes at a lower rate than had been offered by any private company, while at the same time yielding a profit. Since that time two more bond issues—

He had spoken of an original bond issue of $32,000.

> Since that time two more bond issues have been made for extensions and development to meet the increasing demand of the people for this service, with the result that the plant to-day represents an investment of $1,760,755.90, and has a cash surplus on hand of $355,966.

He has a little footnote at that point, in which he says:

> The superintendent of the plant, Mr. Melvin Swanson, informs me that in January, 1928, the lighting department had a surplus of half a million dollars of accumulated profits after giving the people of Jamestown the lowest rates in the State.

I quote again from the main article:

> Which added to the plant investment brings its assets up to $2,116,721. Deducting the outstanding indebtedness of $204,000 there remains for the people a clear equity of $1,912,721.

Quoting from further on in the article:

> The Jamestown plant generates power from coal and successfully competes with water power generated from Niagara Falls and supplied by a private syndicate, which succeeded in acquiring the franchise rights from the original private company to whom the city had granted a franchise prior to the establishment of the municipal plant.

Here we have a municipally owned plant, operating with coal, that must be shipped in on the railroad, in competition with a private plant which gets its power from Niagara Falls.

Often when these comparisons are made, particularly with some of the hydroelectric commission rates in Canada, those opposed to municipal ownership of public utilities say that we are unfair because we compare the rates here with a publicly owned corporation in Canada that gets its power so cheap from Niagara Falls. In the comparison I am now making the reverse is true. The privately owned company operating in Jamestown gets its current from Niagara Falls.

The municipally owned plant gets its current from a coal-operated plant, which coal it has to buy and it is not the cheapest coal in the world either because it has to be shipped in. Jamestown is not located at the mouth of a coal mine. Jamestown is not far from Niagara Falls. It is within transmission distance; I think probably less than 100 miles away.

The article then continues:

> The charges of this company for electric service—

Referring to the private company now. The private company gets its electricity from Niagara Falls and operates not only within the city limits but outside. The municipally owned company is handicapped by the laws of the State of New York in that it is not permitted to sell electricity outside of the municipal corporation limits.

> The charges of this [private] company for electric service, just outside of the city limits, are nearly double the rates charged by the municipal plant, although the private company is compelled as a result of the municipal competition to sell at the same low rates within the city.

This is another illustration that will demonstrate that the private companies can sell current in this country for much less than they are now charging. They are compelled to do so where they meet the competition of publicly owned plants, and this is an illustration of it. In the city of Jamestown, N. Y., the private company is selling electricity within the city limits of Jamestown at the low rate of 4.5 cents per kilowatt-hour, because that is the rate fixed by the municipal plant, and yet just outside of the city limits, where the municipal plant can not compete, it is charging practically double that rate.

Mr. President, I have here a list of a large number of municipalities in the State of New York, which list is contained in the article from which I am quoting. I ask unanimous consent to include this table at this point in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I want to say to the Senator that we had a hearing in Albany, when I was a member of the New York State Senate, upon proposed legislation which was intended to give to municipalities the power to issue bonds for the purpose of constructing their own lighting plants. There we had present the mayors of every municipality which had engaged in the business of generating and distributing to its residents electricity. In every instance the proof presented clearly established that the consumer was charged by the municipality a price lower than was charged by the private companies which the municipally owned company supplanted.

While I am on my feet I may say to the Senator that I was very much interested in the disparities in rates between the Canadian company and the Niagara Falls, N. Y., company, to which the Senator called attention the other day. We have time and time again in New York called attention to this disparity in our efforts to prevent the private exploitation of the St. Lawrence River potential water power. We have called attention to the fact that initially the State of New York made a blunder in Niagara Falls in not itself constructing the plant and using itself the diversion of the water of Niagara Falls to generate electricity. It would be enjoying, I am sure, cheaper rates than are now charged by the Niagara Falls Electric Co. That is the basis of our fight in New York, to prevent private interest—and has been at issue in several campaigns—from securing the control of the water power at the St. Lawrence River, when harnessed, but to preserve it for public ownership and control.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no doubt about what the Senator from New York has said, and I thank him for his interruption.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. When the Senator from New York is making that comparison, may I ask if he makes due allowance in the matter of the municipally owned plant for taxes, and due allowance for depreciation, and due allowance for the fact that a municipal plant's deficit is very often covered up by the municipal tax rates?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am very glad to yield to Senators, but I do not want to yield for the purpose of other Senators engaging in debate during the course of my remarks.

Mr. BRUCE. May I ask the Senator under what order we are proceeding? I thought we were proceeding under Rule VIII, and if so, I think the Senator from Nebraska has considerably exceeded his five minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not limited to five minutes.

Mr. BRUCE. Under Rule VIII?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution now before the Senate was taken up on motion.

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, I did not know that.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have discussed the tax question, and I have laid tables and documents and statistics before the Senate by the volume. I am not going into the question of taxes now, but it is very easily disposed of. So far as taxes are concerned, they will never make a greater difference in the price of electricity to the consumer than to exceed a few mills on a kilowatt hour.

Now, reading further from this article, I wish to call attention to what the city of Jamestown did. Senators will remember that it had issued bonds in the amount of nearly $2,000,000 all together. It is now practically out of debt, only about $250,000 of the bonds being left, while the citizens are getting the benefit of this low rate. This article states:

All bonds have been paid out of the revenues. There has never been any tax levy for any purposes whatever in connection with the plant. If the city did not have competition and had exclusive sale of current and sold the same at the same rate at which the competing private company charges outside of the city, beyond municipal competition, there would be sufficient profit to wipe out all taxes for city and school purposes. In other words, the people save enough as the result of present low rates, through municipal ownership, to pay these taxes.

The saving to the people in low rates exceeds $5,000,000 during the last 20 years.

That is easily computed, and is an almost mathematical deduction. In Jamestown, however, a private company, getting its current from Niagara Falls, went into court and tried to obtain an injunction against the municipal company fixing such a cheap rate for electricity which they produced from coal that the private company claimed it was below the cost of production. It actually commenced a lawsuit. This article further states:

Some time ago the private company tried to persuade the city officials to enter into a contract by the terms of which the private company offered to furnish lighting for street purposes at a lower rate than now supplied by the city, but with the stipulation that the city bind itself not to make any further enlargement in the capacity of the municipal plant. There were many citizens and some members of the city council who were captivated by this alluring proposition and urged its acceptance on the part of the city. But the friends of the municipal ownership, however, were able to discern the scheme back of this proposition, which meant in reality crippling municipal service and placing the city eventually at the mercy of the private company.

One of the leading newspapers of the city advocated this scheme, and there has been a continuous effort to mold public sentiment against the public plant.

So successful—

I am now quoting from an editorial in one of the newspapers published in Jamestown:

So successful has been the management of the municipal plant that those in control decided upon a considerable reduction in rates, and then a strange thing happened. The private power company that has been in competition with the municipal plant filed a petition with the utility commission of the State insisting that the municipal plant must raise its rates.

There you have it—the private company in competition with the municipal company went before the commission and filed a petition demanding that the municipal plant be compelled to increase its rates. The article continues:

This is such an astonishing procedure that it has led the Jamestown Journal, in a long editorial in its issue of August 14, to declare that this is—

"Probably one of the most unique and unusual proceedings that has ever claimed the attention of the Public Service Commission of New York. It is a proceeding to compel a corporation (municipality) to raise electric light rates."

The editorial then goes on to state:

"The proceeding is brought by the Niagara Power Co. against the city of Jamestown. The Niagara company contends that the rates are below cost, hence impose an unlawful burden on the taxpayers, of which this company is one, and incidentally makes competition impossible without being confiscatory of its property."

* * * * * * *

On the specific question as to whether the reduced rates proposed by the municipal plant are sufficient to meet all costs of operation, maintenance, capital charges, sinking fund, etc., the representatives of the city contend that in spite of the lower rates in effect during 1927 the plant earned a net profit of $162,336.43.

That is in one year under the low rate which the private company said was confiscatory.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I was not in the Chamber during the beginning of the Senator's remarks, and I desire to ask him what percentage of the business has the municipal plant?

Mr. NORRIS. It has most of the business, I judge from what I have read, although I can not give specific figures as to that.

Mr. DILL. Do the returns of the other company show a deficit?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; it is one of the Power Trust companies of the United States.

Mr. DILL. I thought, possibly, that it was one of those the trust was sustaining in order to compete with the municipally owned plant.

Mr. NORRIS. No; there is not anything to indicate that they ever had a deficit.

The profit that I have just read was over and above all charges required by the city charter. And that was the profit in 1927, just a year ago.

Furthermore, the plant now has on hand the sum of $481,060.76 to provide for the extension, improvement, and betterment of the plant and its equipment. Thus all reasonable contingencies are provided for.

The city further replies to the contention of the private power company that the taxpayers of the city of Jamestown have not contributed one single dollar toward the erection, improvement, or operation of the plant. The initial costs and a portion required for improvements and extensions have been met by bond issues, it is true, but the principal and interest of such bond issues have been paid out of the earnings of the plant itself and such earnings have been paid entirely by the consumers of the current sold by the plant.

* * * * * * *

Another notable and very significant feature in the recent development of the Jamestown plant is reported to us by the superintendent [of the plant], Mr. Melvin O. Swanson.

He says:

That at a special meeting of the board of public utilities held on October 18 it was decided to advertise for bids for a new 12,500-kilowatt turbogenerating unit. This unit, when installed, will be the largest in the plant, and will more than double the present generating capacity.

Mr. Swanson, the superintendent, continues:

This equipment will be purchased from revenues, and it is planned to expend well over half a million dollars in enlargements.

This money—

Says the superintendent—

we have saved during the last four or five years, and we now have sufficient capital on hand so that we can proceed immediately with the authorization and purchase of the equipment and extensions to the buildings.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. For how many years has this municipal plant been in operation?

Mr. NORRIS. It has been in operation for 34 years.

Mr. DILL. When it started was there a private plant then furnishing electricity to the city?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and there still is.

Mr. DILL. Does it own its own power site?

Mr. NORRIS. The municipal plant?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it has a steam plant, as I have already told the Senate.

The article continues:

Thus the Jamestown municipal plant not only reduced rates to the lowest in the State of New York, but it has paid for itself out of earnings, accumulated a sufficient surplus each year to pay for extensions and improvements, and is at the present moment adding new equipment that is doubling the capacity of the plant. And it has all been paid for out of the earnings at rates so low that the private power companies that are competing with the plant have been compelled to resort to the most desperate measures in trying to protect themselves from the extremely low rates made possible by the success of the municipal plant.

Mr. President, I want to give a sort of summary of what has been accomplished by this plant. From the operation of the lighting plant we find the following deducible facts:

In the year 1927 this plant generated practically 20,000,000 kilowatt-hours more than was developed in the year 1917, 10 years before.

Since 1917 it has just about doubled the number of poles, amount of wire, and the number of street lights.

It had over three times as many consumers in 1927 as in 1917.

During the past three years it has averaged over 90 per cent of all new connections. In other words, out of every 100 electrical connections made by the city of Jamestown the municipality has secured 90 of them. That shows, I take it, that they are getting 90 per cent of the new business in the city, showing that the people of Jamestown are satisfied with the operation of their own plant.

The net gain in profits for the year 1927 was approximately fifteen times the profits of the year 1917, and still they have been cutting the rate down lower and lower.

The municipal plant investment in the year 1927 was over five times the investment of 1917.

The total bonds outstanding is less in dollars and cents than the profits of one year.

The total cash receipts or collections in the year 1927 were over five times the collections in 1917, and it should be noted that the $715,076.77 includes the repayment of loans in the amount of some $185,000 and does not represent only cash receipts from current sold.

Speaking of loans, some one will say, "What business have they to loan money? To whom did they loan money?" The answer is that this municipal plant loaned to the city more than $125,000; so that they not only kept up the plant, they not only kept down the rate, but they made money enough to loan to the city more than $100,000.

The cash in the bank at the close of business in the year 1927 was approximately $235,416.16. In 1917, at the close of business that year, they had only $174.78 in bank. They have demand loans—here it comes—in the amount of $120,550, which they consider the same as cash or bills receivable, for it is money loaned on demand to the city council. So this really gives a balance of $355,966.16, with some contingent liabilities outstanding in the form of payments yet to be made on buildings, condensers, and turbine equipment; but all of those contingent expenses put together are less than $25,000. All of these extensions and improvements to the entire plant have been made out of the earnings of the plant itself, for even the bonds outstanding are being retired as rapidly as the issue calls for without taxing the citizens one penny.

That synopsis was taken from the records in December, 1927.

There is one other comparison that I neglected to make the other day of these rates right along the Canadian border.

In the city of Detroit the private company supplying the consumers in domestic service charges them 10 cents per kilowatt-hour for the first 30 hours and 4 cents for the next 120 hours. Just across the line from Detroit is Windsor, getting its electricity from the publicly owned hydroelectric commission of Canada; and the consumers in Windsor, just across the river, pay 2½ cents for the first 60 kilowatt-hours and 1¼ cents for all over that; and yet the electricity that supplies the city of Windsor comes from Niagara Falls and is carried over transmission lines 248 miles.

These few remarks, Mr. President, ought to have been made the other day when I was comparing rates; and I add them now because they were neglected at that time.

PROPOSED NICARAGUAN CANAL

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I regret that I can not agree with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] in his desire to have passed at this time this joint resolution looking to the construction of another canal across Central America.

I have no desire to hold up any legislation that I think is not detrimental to the best interests of the country; but, Mr. President, as far as I can understand the Senator from New Jersey has given no reason why this action will be necessary for many years to come.

I note in the report that the figures are given showing the increase in tonnage of the Panama Canal from 1915 to 1927; and the Senator said that he thinks about 50 per cent of its facilities are now being used. It never has been my privilege to visit the Panama Canal, but I have had considerable information of an authoritative nature on the subject; and I am told by those who claim to know that no ship can enter the canal before 6 o'clock in the morning, and no ship can enter the canal after 2 o'clock in the afternoon, for the reason that there is no night shift on the canal, and therefore the canal can be used only about eight hours of the day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will give the Senator the exact information that he desires about it. This is from the report of the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, on page 17 of his last year's report:

The schedules outlined above for dispatching vessels through the canal require the Atlantic locks to be operated from 7 a. m. to 11 p. m. daily, and the Pacific locks from 6.50 a. m. to 10.50 p. m. daily. Lengthening the hours of transit necessarily would prolong the hours of lock operation, which would mean added difficulties and increased costs of operation not only at the locks but for other divisions of the canal as well. Increase of traffic may eventually make an extension of operating hours advisable, but under present conditions it is not warranted.

So they do have two shifts; they operate the canal on one side from 7 in the morning until 11 at night, and on the other side from 6.50 in the morning until 10.50 at night.

They say that it will be very much more expensive. The increase in the transit of ships is from 1,000 to about 5,500. The traffic has been growing by leaps and bounds; and it is believed by those who are best posted, and if the Senator will examine the authorities I have heretofore given it will be found, that within 10 years, even running three shifts, using every moment of the 24 hours of the day, they can not put through the Panama Canal the ships that will offer there.

Mr. DILL. The Senator makes a wild statement that is not based on the best judgment of those who have computed the commerce; and until we do find ourselves pressed for additional facilities it seems to me that we could well afford to let this matter rest.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. I do not want to take the Senator's time, because I am naturally very anxious that we shall reach a vote; but the Senator suggests that we can well afford to allow the matter to wait. Will the Senator state what possible harm could follow the securing of information, and then, so far as an actual decision upon the part of Congress is concerned for construction, allow that to wait until the time when it would seem wise? What objection can there possibly be to getting information?

Mr. DILL. I think there are a good many objections. I mentioned one of them the other day. I will mention it again.

I notice in this joint resolution that it is proposed that the Chief of Engineers may establish stations and maintain them along the proposed route. I am one of those who believe that the Government is continually finding excuses for keeping the marines in Nicaragua, and I think this will be just another excuse to have some more boys down there and keep them there permanently. So far as I am concerned, I am not going to give my consent to doing anything that will give any additional excuse or reason why American boys should be kept in Nicaragua. They have had the election down there that it was intended to have, and still the marines stay in Nicaragua, with no suggestion, even, that they shall be withdrawn.

I started to call attention to the fact that in the report there is printed a letter from the Secretary of the Navy listing the different investigations that have been had regarding this canal. This is not any unknown, undeveloped, unstudied subject.

They list the fact that in 1872 Captain Lull, of the United States Navy, made an investigation and report.

In 1876 there was an investigation by the Interoceanic Canal Commission.

In 1884 Civil Engineer Menocal, of the United States Navy, made an investigation.

In 1895 there was an investigation by the Nicaragua Canal Board.

From 1897 to 1899 there was an investigation by the Nicaraguan Canal Commission.

In 1901 there was an investigation by the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. And there have been no reports or investigations since; for 27 years.

Mr. DILL. No; there have been none since, because we built the Panama Canal. The Panama Canal has taken care of all the needs of commerce and I believe it will continue to do so.

The Senator from Tennessee, in answer to the suggestion that they were not using the canal as many hours as they can, read the hours that the shifts were working on the two sides. At any rate, they evidently are not running the canal even to 50 per cent of its capacity, because the canal is in actual use only about 50 per cent of the time it is now open; and I repeat that there are many other waterways in this country, there are many other improvements in this country, that need attention far more than the building of a new canal in Central America; and I am especially opposed to anything being done until it becomes absolutely necessary that will necessitate or give reason or color of excuse for keeping the marines in that part of the world.

I note in this report that there is some discussion of the fact that what it is really desired to determine is what it is going to cost to build a sea-level canal; and that is going to be far different from building the canal for which estimates were made, as explained by the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Tennessee, of $70,000,000 to $200,000,000. If you are proposing now to build a sea-level canal, you are proposing to involve the country in an expenditure of tremendous sums of money.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, we are not proposing to build any canal. We are proposing to get the information as to whether a sea-level canal or a lock canal is feasible.

Mr. DILL. But the report says it has already been determined. The Secretary of the Navy, in his report, says that it has already been determined that it is feasible. The Secretary of the Navy, in fact, practically says that no investigation is needed, but that they have not any objection to it if we want to make more investigations.

Mr. EDGE. Does the Senator refer to the Nicaraguan canal or the Panama Canal when he makes that statement?

Mr. DILL. This is about the Nicaraguan canal.

Mr. EDGE. I very much doubt any commission ever having reported that a sea-level canal at Nicaragua was feasible. I have never heard it.

Mr. DILL. Oh, well, now, the Senator takes my own argument. I said that this joint resolution was looking to a sea-level canal, which would involve a tremendous expenditure, and the Senator then said that he did not know about that. Now he comes back and says that the reason for it is to get a sea-level canal.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator from New Jersey did not say anything of the kind. The Senator says we need the information; and I have yet to hear from the Senator from Washington any good reason why the Senate should not have the information.

Mr. DILL. I think we had better find out how much we can enlarge the Panama Canal and what that will cost.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is provided for in this very joint resolution.

Mr. DILL. Oh, yes; and, using that as an excuse, you try to tie on Nicaragua.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. I will say to the Senator that so far as bringing the marines out of Nicaragua is concerned, there is a joint resolution here, introduced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], to have that done. I shall be delighted to join with him in vote for that joint resolution and having the marines brought out. I do not believe that they ought to remain there any more than the Senator from Washington does. It is a shame that we have kept them there this long. We hope we have done some good with them, but they certainly ought to come out.

Mr. DILL. Of course, if the Senator will help get that joint resolution passed before we attempt to pass the Nicaraguan joint resolution, I will confess that one of my reasons would be removed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very happy to do it.

Mr. DILL. But you can not let this joint resolution pass in the hope that you will pass the joint resolution to take out the marines.

In this letter from the Secretary of the Navy, speaking of these various commissions that have made the investigations, the Secretary says:

> All of those who have made sufficient study of the problem to qualify them to form an opinion agree that an interoceanic canal across Nicaragua is feasible and there is general agreement as to the route which the canal should take. The route determines the terminal ports and the prospective use of the canal would determine the extent of the harbor facilities to be provided.
> The report of the Isthmian Canal Commission of 1901 shows what rights, privileges, and franchises, if any, were held and owned by any individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations in respect of the construction of such a canal and what work was done by each or any of the above up to the date of submission of the report. Any subsequent concessions or franchises could be ascertained from the Department of State or by that department from the Nicaraguan and Costa Rican Governments.

These are statements made by the Secretary of the Navy, showing that it is entirely unnecessary to have any new commission, with its employees, go down into Nicaragua and establish stations, such as they would do under this resolution, and when somebody might create some kind of disturbances it would be necessary to have an army of marines down there.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let me explain to the Senator exactly what this means. Under the Bryan treaty we agreed to pay $3,000,000 for the Nicaraguan route, and we have already paid it and we own a route there, but it was left indefinite, it has never been surveyed, and we have no particular route. A tentative suggestion has been made that it goes through the lake of Nicaragua and along the San Juan River, but there has been nothing definite about it; and what we want to do, under this resolution, is really to locate our property; and in order to locate our property there, survey it and locate it, and see what we have, tentatively, at least, we are obliged to have the necessary stations. There is no way around it.

Mr. DILL. I do not doubt at all what the Senator says, that if we go in to get this information and locate this route, we will have stations, and this $150,000 is only a beginning. In fact, this resolution called for $500,000 when it was originally introduced, and I think at least that much will be expended before we get through with it. Then the Bureau of the Budget suggested that it be cut to $250,000 and now it has been cut down to $150,000. After they go down there and work for a year or two, they will come back and say, "We have gotten the work started and we have this money invested in the investigation, and we will have to have some more." Then, when we have spent three or four hundred thousand dollars and located this route, and determined all these details about a sea-level canal, we will be told that we have an investment of $3,000,000, which we paid for our route, and that we have paid out all this other money, and will have to have this canal pretty soon, and therefore we should begin to build it.

Once that is done, it will become necessary for the Government's interests to be protected. It is within the memory of all of us here how, when the Panama Canal was built, we saw fit and found it necessary to have a Republic of Panama formed, which would be dominated by the United States Government, and just as certainly as we ever go down to put this proposed canal through Nicaragua, there will be a strip of country along the canal that will be practically dominated and controlled by the American Government. A large part of the purpose behind this is the exploitation of Nicaragua. A large part of the sentiment behind this is being built up by those who hope to profit by the exploitation of the resources of Nicaragua, and the floating of the American flag over that part of Central America.

Until conditions have developed at Panama which show that there is necessity, at least a pressing need, for additional canal facilities, I think we ought to use our money for investigation and study and survey purposes in connection with the waterways of our own country of a domestic nature.

I want now to read further from the letter of the Secretary of the Navy:

> The Isthmian Canal Commission stated "The Republics of Nicaragua and Costa Rica are untrammeled by any existing concessions or treaty obligations and are free to grant to the United States the rights necessary for the attainment of these ends" (November 16, 1901, Report, p. 174). The Bryan-Chamorro treaty of August 5, 1914, between the United States and Nicaragua assures to the United States in perpetuity the exclusive right to build this canal.

So there is no new right we need to acquire. We have gotten those rights, and we have paid for them. There is no need for sending a lot of men down there now, unless it be preparatory to actually building the canal. If we are going to propose the building of a sea-level canal, we must have a revision in cost that will not stop at a few millions; it will run up to probably a billion or several billions of dollars, rather than the amount that has been suggested here.

I say, further, that the Secretary of the Navy reports there is no need for this investigation. I read further from his letter:

> The Navy Department considers that previous boards and commissions have made exhaustive studies of the proposed Nicaraguan canal and have ascertained that a canal is feasible. Practicable routes have been investigated and, subject to minor changes, the most practicable route has been ascertained. The Navy Department, however, sees no objection to the proposed legislation which will authorize an investigation and survey for the purpose of bringing up to date the information obtained by the Isthmian Canal Commission and for collecting additional information.

So that the report of the Secretary of the Navy, after setting out the fact that we have all the information we really need to have, then says that they are not going to object to it if Congress wants to pass it. But it is clear from their report that the Secretary of the Navy believes that we have all the really needful information, except what might be needed to determine whether we are going to build an ocean-level canal or not, and if that is what is in the minds of those who want to build this canal, then they must prepare the country for enormous appropriations, and for the spending of amounts of money such as have never been spent on any great waterway of this kind.

The Secretary goes on:

> The Navy Department further sees no objection to the amendment intended to be proposed by Senator EDGE which will authorize an engineering survey and investigation for the purpose of determining the possibility and cost of enlarging the Panama Canal to the extent which may be necessary to meet the future needs of interoceanic shipping.

In other words, before we have determined to what an extent we can enlarge the Panama Canal, or what it will cost to enlarge it, we are to set up an investigation of building an ocean-level canal in Nicaragua. It seems to me we ought to be reasonable and sane in our spending of money looking to the building of a great waterway of this kind. Certainly, after the number of investigations we have already had, we will not be without information when the time comes when there is really need for a new canal.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. In view of the fact it is apparent that the Senator is not going to permit a vote, I want to set his mind at rest so far as the possibility of a sea-level canal in Nicaragua is concerned, speaking, of course, from a layman's standpoint. My best judgment based on some information is that the cost would be absolutely prohibitive to build a sea-level canal in Nicaragua. But it has been discussed so often in the press of the country and in other ways that while the engineers are considering the feasibility of a lock canal and as to the best location, the information necessary for the building of a waterway on sea level might just as well be ascertained; but if the Senator has lurking in his mind the idea that there is some hidden effort to put the Government to billions of dollars of expense to build a sea-level canal, it is entirely his own imagination. Nevertheless, I repeat, there is no reason in the world why the Senate of the United States should not have the full information.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I was led to discuss the sea-level canal largely because, when I demonstrated from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, that the information at present available in the reports made shows that the other canal is feasible, the Senator rose and pointed out that no commission had yet declared a sea-level canal was feasible. When the Senator suggested that, I was led to think that the purpose of this resolution was to determine the feasibility of a sea-level canal, and the cost, and the other attendant facts that would have to be determined.

Mr. EDGE. I am afraid the Senator is permitting his imagination to influence his line of argument on that particular phase of the subject.

Mr. DILL. I secured the idea from the Senator from New Jersey when I mentioned the fact that the Secretary of the Navy had already reported that it was feasible. The Senator then rose and insisted that nobody had ever stated whether a sea-level canal was feasible or not feasible, and he wanted to get the informatiton.

Mr. EDGE. Is there any objection to getting the information?

Mr. DILL. No; but why rush it; why be in such a hurry. What is the reason? The Panama Canal is not yet used to 50 per cent of its capacity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, more than that.

Mr. DILL. Suppose more than 50 per cent is used. Apparently the volume can be increased. What is the reason for the tremendous pressure that would make us rush this information on the Nicaraguan situation?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator if the sea-level feature was not one of the grounds upon which former Senator Morgan, of Alabama, stressed the advisability of using Nicaragua as against Panama? Of course, I have not read up on the matter lately, but my impression all along was that the tremendous advantage of a sea-level canal, everything else being equal, was so manifest to everyone that he did not see why, at such an extraordinary additional cost, we accepted Panama in place of Nicaragua.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator is entirely right about that. That is exactly what occurred. Senator Morgan was firmly of the opinion that a sea-level canal could be built there, and that if it could it would manifestly be to the interest of the United States to build it there.

Mr. DILL. Then my suggestion was not so wild when I said that the purpose back of this may be to build a sea-level canal, to which the Senator from New Jersey took such strong exception and talked about the awful expense that was being suggested.

Mr. EDGE. If it could be done, it would be very much better done that way.

Mr. DILL. I am certain that if the intention is not to build a sea-level canal there is plenty of information on the subject available now.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator speaks of the urgency, of the haste demonstrated, in endeavoring to get this information now, as if we were not faced with the necessity of making decision certainly within a reasonably short time. Was it urgent when the Panama Canal Commission was appointed some 28 or 29 years ago and reported 27 years ago? There was not much knowledge and not a great deal of argument, but there was no fixed sentiment whatever in the country for the building of any canal. Now we have a canal, and now we are faced with the constant problem of administering the canal, and it becomes a pertinent question for Congress to deal with.

Mr. DILL. The Senator knows that for many years there was a great demand for a canal to connect the two oceans, and the question of whether it should be a canal across the Isthmus of Panama or across Nicaragua was a debated question, and naturally a commission to study that was necessary. But I repeat, I have not seen any reason for the urgent action which the Senator from New Jersey keeps insisting upon. I do not know who it is who is calling upon the Senator from New Jersey to rush this matter through. I do not know anybody who can not get his ships through from the Pacific to the Atlantic. Is there some great organization that fears that one of these days they will not be able to get their ships through the canal? There ought to be some showing that there is a public demand of some kind before we embark upon a program that will cost literally hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. EDGE. Does the Senator think a report of the Governor of the Panama Canal should be given any consideration whatever?

Mr. DILL. I think the report of the Governor of the Panama Canal does not show any particular demand for building a new canal yet.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the resolution, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be received and will lie upon the table.

Mr. HAWES's amendment was to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the President is hereby authorized to appoint a Nicaraguan canal commission to be composed of five members, three of whom shall be officers in the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, and two shall be eminent civilian engineers. The civilian engineers shall be paid such compensation as the President may direct. The President shall designate one of the members to act as chairman.

SEC. 2. The Nicaraguan canal commission appointed under authority of this act shall make a full and complete investigation and survey for the purpose of revising and bringing down to date the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission transmitted to the Congress December 4, 1901, and for the purpose of collecting the additional information and data necessary in order to ascertain (1) the most practicable route for an interoceanic ship canal by way of the San Juan River and the Great Lake of Nicaragua or by way of any route over Nicaraguan territory, including a suitable harbor at each of the termini thereof; (2) the feasibility and approximate cost of construction and maintenance of such canal; and (3) the cost of acquiring all private rights, privileges, and franchises, if any, pertaining to such route. The investigation and survey shall be made upon the basis of a canal having a capacity sufficient for the convenient passage of vessels of such tonnage and draft as may reasonably be anticipated.

SEC. 3. The Nicaraguan canal commission shall establish and maintain during the investigation and survey thereafter such stations as it deems necessary for gauging the water supply available for the operation of the canal.

SEC. 4. The Nicaraguan canal commission shall also make an engineering survey and an investigation for the purpose of determining the possibilities and cost of enlarging the Panama Canal to the extent which may be necessary to meet the future needs of interoceanic shipping.

SEC. 5. The Government of Nicaragua having by treaty with the Government of the United States, signed at Washington on August 5, 1914, and duly ratified as required by the laws of both of said Governments and proclaimed June 24, 1916, granted in perpetuity to the Government of the United States forever free from taxation or other public charge, the exclusive proprietary rights necessary and convenient for the construction, operation, and maintenance of an interoceanic canal, by way of the San Juan River and the Great Lake of Nicaragua, or by way of any route over Nicaraguan territory, the details of the terms upon which such canal shall be constructed, operated, and maintained to be agreed to by the two Governments.

The President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to enter into negotiations for an agreement upon the details of the terms under which such canal may be constructed, operated, and maintained: Provided, That nothing contained in this resolution shall be construed to bind the United States to build said Nicaraguan canal.

SEC. 6. The Senate of the United States having incorporated in its resolution advising and consenting to ratification of the treaty with Nicaragua, as aforesaid, a declaration "that in advising and consenting to the ratification of the said convention as amended such advice and consent are given with the understanding, to be expressed as a part of the instrument of ratification, that nothing in said convention is intended to affect any existing right of any of the said named states," namely, Costa Rica, Salvador, and Honduras, the President is authorized and empowered to enter into negotiations with said States and determine whether they, or any of them, have any interest in said proposed canal.

SEC. 7. There is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $150,000, to be expended by the Nicaraguan canal commission for the purposes of this resolution and to remain available until expended; and there are hereby authorized to be appropriated such additional sums as may be necessary for such purposes.

SEC. 8. The President is requested to report to the Congress, as soon as practicable, not later than two years, the results of the investigation and survey, together with such recommendations in connection therewith as he deems advisable.

Mr. WHEELER. I was not here when the discussion started, and I want to ask the Senator with reference to how long it will be before the Panama Canal will be used to its capacity.

Mr. DILL. Nobody knows. There are different estimates. It is said that it is now used to about 50 per cent of its capacity, and the facilities at the Panama Canal, it is admitted, can be greatly enlarged. To the part of the resolution relating to the Panama Canal I have no objection, and if the Senator will amend the resolution so as to make it provide simply for the spending of money to find out what it will cost to enlarge the Panama Canal I will withdraw any objection I have to the resolution. What I object to is the part of it providing that we shall go into Nicaragua and start upon the Nicaraguan canal.

Mr. EDGE. In other words, the Senator does not want us to investigate the reason for having made an investment of $3,000,000.

Mr. DILL. That was investigated and decided upon long before we made the investment of $3,000,000, as the Senator well knows. No administration and no Congress would have appropriated $3,000,000 if the matter had not been sufficiently investigated.

Mr. EDGE. But since we have made the investment the Senator does not want us to follow it up and make a completed investigation?

Mr. DILL. When we are ready to build a Nicaraguan canal, and actually consider it, it will be plenty of time to make the necessary borings and do the necessary investigating work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, House bill 11526, the cruiser bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I still have the floor. I do not lose the floor merely because the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington is correct. He is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, as I was saying when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived, when the time comes that we are in real need of additional facilities for ships to cross from one ocean to the other I shall be glad to assist in the passage of a joint resolution to appropriate the necessary funds for the purpose indicated. If the present joint resolution were confined to learning whatever facts it is necessary to know with reference to the enlargement of the Panama Canal, I should be glad to favor it, but my objection is to tying up with a clearly desirable request, namely, the securing of information about Panama, an undesirable plan to start on an investigation of the facts as to a sea level in Central America.

Mr. President, I understand the cruiser bill is the unfinished business and should come before the Senate at 2 o'clock. I do not care to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing the canal resolution any further during the time when the unfinished business should be before the Senate.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. HALE, and Mr. JOHNSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to enable me to submit a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I had addressed the Chair twice and was standing in my place before the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] had concluded and yielded the floor. I wonder if there is anything wrong with the eyesight of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have it examined. Meantime the Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON] is unavoidably detained because of necessary absence from the city. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me to enable me to submit a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. I desire to submit the following unanimous-consent request, that after the hour of 2 o'clock on Wednesday, January 30, 1929, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill H. R. 11526, or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request made by the Senator from Maine?

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, let us see if we can not reach an agreement by yielding to any Senator who wants further time for debate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator from Idaho any suggestions to offer?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understood there was objection to the request of the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] objected.

Mr. HALE. Would the Senator offer any suggestion that would meet his views about a unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. WHEELER. I may do so later, but not at this particular time.

Mr. SWANSON. Would the Senator agree to limit debate beginning next Friday?

Mr. WHEELER. I would not agree at this particular time to any specific time to vote upon the measure.

Mr. HALE. I had hoped very much that we could get some kind of an agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair suggest to the junior Senator from Montana that the unanimous-consent proposal of the Senator from Maine is not to fix a time to take a vote but merely to limit debate.

Mr. HALE. I hope very much that we may reach some kind of an agreement. Otherwise we shall have to hold night sessions, and many Senators do not like to have that done.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator, in my judgment, is too early with his request. Those who have favored the bill have had unlimited time to debate it.

Mr. HALE. Everyone has had unlimited time.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but the time has been taken by those who favor the bill. Let the debate run on a while. Let those who want to make extended speeches—and I am not one of them, I will say to the Senator—make them, and then we can reach an agreement, I think, without any trouble to limit debate. The Senator, after he has been listening to long speeches by those who favor the bill, ought not to ask that a limitation be put on those who are opposed to the measure. I shall not consent to it at this time.

Mr. HALE. I thought my proposal would give Senators ample opportunity to be heard, but if the Senator thinks not, perhaps we can arrange differently.

Mr. NORRIS. We ought to do like we usually do—let debate run along until everyone has had an opportunity to present his views.

Mr. HALE. In the meanwhile, I give notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to remain for a night session, and I shall be obliged to continue that plan unless we can make some arrangement for an early termination of the debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the unanimous-consent request submitted by the Senator from Maine. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has been recognized.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield further to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it is perfectly evident that the construction of the cruisers contemplated by the bill under consideration looks to a war primarily with Great Britain and secondarily with Japan. No one has intimated any likelihood even of the most remote nature of a clash with any other country, rendering it prudent to expend a quarter of a billion dollars for the extension of our Naval Establishment. No one has ventured the opinion that, as it stands, it is not adequate to meet any contingencies that may arise out of any controversy in which our country may become involved with any other, save only the two mentioned.

It is not to be understood that any fears have been expressed or even felt of the prospect of war, so far as the future can at present be foreseen with either of those powers with which we are now happily on the most amicable terms. With the one we have an unbroken record of peaceful and friendly relations, and with the other 115 years have gone by since the specter of war last divided us, during all of which time, so little was a resumption of hostilities to be expected, that 3,000 miles of common frontier has remained unfortified by either nation.

Some acute differences have meanwhile arisen between the United States and Great Britain, but they have all been adjusted by pacific means, and no reason is apparent for doubting that, except in a contingency to be adverted to, the same sensible course will not be pursued as to future controversies. Indeed it must be conceded that with the ever-increasing intimacy and magnitude of the commercial ties between the two countries, the cordiality induced by reciprocal travel, the amelioration of the relations between the racial stocks making up the population of the British Isles, so called, and a multitude of other considerations, including the gratifying decay of the war spirit and the attenuation of the bonds between the units of the British Empire, the purpose of the people of the two great English-speaking nations to avoid armed conflict is being constantly strengthened and that the probability of such an unspeakable catastrophe to both nations grows more and more remote. Nevertheless it might as well be admitted on both sides of the Atlantic that the two countries are to-day engaged in competitive naval construction.

Without going into the details of the exchanges taking place at the Geneva conference, no one can be deceived into the belief that each side, in the attitude it took, was not contemplating war with the other.

It has been said in the debate on the pending bill that the Navy of Great Britain makes a force equal to the combined navies of the world, exclusive of that of the United States. On the other hand, our Navy surpasses in its entirety that of any other nation save only Great Britain. Disregarding the contingency of a war between these two great powers, it is difficult to understand why either of them should maintain a naval establishment even approaching in magnitude those now supported by them. On both sides of the water it is offered that navies even larger than those maintained are necessary or desirable to protect commerce. But, except that war is in progress and thus commerce is interfered with, it has no occasion to call for assistance from ships of war. Piratical operations are no longer to be feared on the high seas, nor for that matter in inland waters, save only where government is inefficient or chaos reigns in consequence of revolution or other untoward conditions, as in China, where the situation is met by the use of fighting craft of the lowest grade. British merchant ships go everywhere unmolested when the nations are at peace, and so do those of the United States. The commerce of either is likely to be interrupted in the event of the prevalence of a war in which it is a neutral, when it ought to have a navy adequate to the protection of its neutral rights. Having such a contingency in mind, it will have regard to the naval equipment of a possible antagonist.

Both nations are now abundantly provided as against any other. Expansion in anticipation of such interference is entirely unjustifiable. It is unnecessary for present purposes to consider how perfectly the British Empire is safeguarded against a hostile movement on the part of any nation so far as her navy can afford protection, but her supremacy on the seas—again disregarding the United States—would seem to be so well established as to remove all ground for apprehension in that regard. Our country is fortunately so situated that the idea of the landing on our shores of a hostile force approaches the chimerical. The argument mainly relied upon in Great Britain in support of the policy of a navy without an equal is that it is absolutely essential that commerce through her ports be uninterrupted that a constant food supply may reach her people—that if the regular flow of foodstuffs from beyond her borders were cut off by a superior naval force her people would be speedily reduced to starvation. On our side it is with truth represented that, with a naval establishment inferior to that of Great Britain, when that country is at war, we carry on trade with foreign countries only as she permits us; that, pursuing her policy of starving her enemy by shutting off, or attempting to shut off, all access to it by water, she is perfectly regardless of the rights of neutrals under international law.

The English contention is not without force; indeed, it is so substantial in character that many Americans, with very little reflection on the position in which it puts the United States, accept it unreservedly and subscribe to the view that Great Britain must, of necessity, maintain the position she has occupied for over three centuries as "mistress of the seas."

History but too well justifies the American claim that our trade is carried on when Britain is a belligerent only by her sufferance, and that she is ruthless in the restrictions she imposes and entirely regardless of the principles of international law generally recognized, and even declared by her own courts.

The War of 1812 was the direct consequence of the oppressive acts of the British Admiralty during the Napoleonic wars, acts of such an aggravating character that in indignation at the patience exhibited by the President, James Madison, a more quick-tempered citizen declared he could not be kicked into a fight. When that peace-loving President was eventually reluctantly impelled to recommend to Congress that war be declared he summarized the principal grievance in the following paragraph:

> Under pretended blockades, without the presence of an adequate force, and sometimes without the practicability of applying one, our commerce has been plundered in every sea, the great staples of our country have been cut off from their legitimate markets, and a destructive blow aimed at our agricultural and maritime interests. In aggravation of these predatory measures they have been considered as in force from the dates of their notification, a retrospective effect being thus added, as has been done in other important cases, to the unlawfulness of the course pursued. And to render the outrage the more signal these mock blockades have been reiterated and enforced in the face of official communications from the British Government declaring as the true definition of a legal blockade "that particular ports must be actually invested and previous warning given to vessels bound to them not to enter." (Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. 1, p. 501.)

I disclaim any purpose in referring to this unpleasant page in the history of our relations with Great Britain to foment or revive any ill will toward that country. I entertain the most fervent hope that the amity that has so long subsisted may never be disturbed. As heretofore stated, a breach therein would, in my judgment, be unspeakably calamitous.

Mention was made of the primary cause of the last armed conflict between the two nations with intent to make clear that our commerce suffered similarly and our dignity as a Nation was in like manner affronted when Great Britain was again confronted by powerful enemies on the Continent in the World War. So grave were her offenses, so serious was the situation precipitated by them, that the London Observer in a recent number (I quote from its issue of December 2, 1928), said:

> Friction on the subject of neutral rights at sea was so acute during the first half of the World War that had the Germans been more judicious, America might have come into the conflict on the other side.

Were it not that the overwhelming sentiment of America was, even from the beginning, with the allied powers, the repeated indignities inflicted before Germany entered upon her campaign of frightfulness might have culminated in armed resistance as those suffered a century before did.

Events transpiring since have contributed to obscure the general recollection of the course pursued by the British admiralty that drew from our Government repeated and vigorous protest, the effect of which our ambassador, Walter Hines Page, with engaging frankness, but with little credit to the fidelity with which he represented our Government, tells in his book on the stirring times of his service in London, he did what he could to nullify.

In an appendix to the note of Secretary Lansing to Mr. Page of date October 21, 1915, are listed some of the graver infractions of our rights on the seas with reference to specific instances to sustain each general charge.

Among the offenses thus listed are (I quote from the schedule):

> (1) Vessels whose cargoes and papers have been of such character as to require but brief time for examination, have been held in British ports, according to this Government's information, for prolonged periods, in some instances for more than a month, and then released without the institution of prize court proceedings.

As indicative of the character of the interference thus complained of, I quote from the appendix as to the first case listed, as follows:

> The steamer Chester, which sailed from Baton Rouge for Rotterdam with a cargo of illuminating oil, was taken into Falmouth September 21, 1914, and held until November 4 of that year.
> (2) Vessels have been held until they have * * * reconsigned their cargoes to a consignee in a neutral country designated by the British Government.

Under this heading reference is made to a ship held in a British port for nearly a month, the greater part of the cargo of which, loaded in New York under the supervision of the British consul general, was fresh fruit, the whole consigned to a Netherlands house, the shippers being compelled to reconsign to the Netherlands Overseas Trust.

> (3) Detentions have been made without evidence amounting to probable cause.

This charge is supported by reference to a number of cases, including that of the ship Annam, en route to a Swedish port, which was detained at Kirkwall in April, 1915, on "suspicion" that a part of her cargo, which consisted of food products, was destined for Germany.

> (4) Vessels have been held, according to statements of the British Government, because of the manner in which shipments have been consigned.

Instances are cited in which the mere fact that cargoes destined for neutral ports were consigned "to order" were regarded as justifying seizure.

> (5) Goods have been seized by the British Government on the ground, as this Government has been informed, that the country to which they were shipped had not prohibited their export.

Copper shipped to Sweden was held because that country had not prohibited the reexportation of that metal; on the other hand, though Italy had prohibited the export of copper, seizures of consignments to that country were repeatedly made.

> (6) The British authorities have repeatedly seized articles classified as contraband, articles classified as conditional contraband, as well as noncontraband goods, shipped to Scandinavian countries, to the Netherlands, and to Italy, then neutral, although the reexportation of such commodities from these countries had been forbidden.

Under this heading reference is made to the case of the American ship Joseph W. Fordney, carrying a cargo of cattle fodder, taken within 4 miles of the coast of Norway and brought into Kirkwall, the exportation of commodities of that character being prohibited by Sweden to a port of the country to which the ship was destined.

> (7) Detentions have been made pending assurances that embargoed goods would be allowed to pass through a neutral country to Great Britain's allies.

A cargo of cotton from Galveston to Gothenberg, Sweden, for transshipment to Moscow was held up for a month, and the ship carrying it required to go around the North Cape with it to Archangel.

> (8) From time to time this Government has been informed of the seizure of cargoes on the ground that consignees have been known to trade with the enemy or because they were suspected of doing so.

A consignment of rubber on a Swedish ship was detained because the consignee was "regarded with grave suspicion."

> (9) Vessels have been seized and brought into port and have been required by the British authorities to pay pilotage, harbor, unlading, warehouse, storage, or other dues, costs, and expenses in advance of a judicial determination of the validity of the seizure of vessel or cargo.

This charge is likewise supported by reference to specific instances.

> (10) Detentions of vessels proceeding from European ports.

Reference is made to the particularly aggravating circumstances of the seizure of the goods of Americans en route from a European port to the United States.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment before he goes any further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator has enumerated many violations of our neutrality, many grievances that were filed with the British Foreign Office. Many of these grievances grew out of the so-called doctrine of continuous voyage and ultimate destination. As I remember Lord Grey's letter to Mr. Page, in answering the protests that were made he made the charge that that doctrine had been initiated by the Government of the United States at the time of the Civil War, and quoted decisions of United States prize courts upholding the doctrine of continuous voyage and ultimate destination. Will the Senator discuss that phase of the British point of view?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, as stated later, of course it need not be said that to all of these complaints of infractions of our rights as neutrals some kind of a plausible answer was made by the British Government; and much reliance was placed upon the doctrine of continuous voyage said to have been developed by this Government and by our courts during the Civil War.

The doctrine of continuous voyage, even if extended to its utmost limits, can not possibly account for more than a small number of these cases. But even some American newspapers have attempted to excuse or extenuate or justify many of these seizures by stating that we did the same thing in the Civil War; that we paid no attention to international law; and in that connection reference is made to the development of the doctrine of continuous voyage.

The fact about the matter is that the doctrine of continuous voyage, as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, was laid down in accordance with the decisions of the English prize courts; and the decisions of the English prize courts upon cases coming before them during the Napoleonic wars were referred to by the Supreme Court of the United States for the elaboration of the continuous-voyage doctrine.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It was originally an English doctrine?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was an English doctrine. It was adopted by our Supreme Court. I might say in that connection that in the negotiations which gave rise to the Washington treaty for the adjustment of claims between this country and Great Britain after the war, in 1870 or 1871—I have forgotten which date—Great Britain recognized the correctness of and accepted the doctrine of continuous voyage as elucidated by the Supreme Court of the United States, although very vigorous protest was voiced by other European nations, but never by Great Britain. So that our Government during the late war never objected in the slightest degree to the application of the doctrine of continuous voyage. That is to say, if goods were going to a neutral port merely as a cover for running a blockade of an enemy port, our Government never made any complaint at all about those things.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Was not that doctrine the sole basis for the rationing or the practical licensing of our commerce by Great Britain and France when they were at war? They took the standpoint that everything that went to neutral ports, to Holland or to the Scandinavian countries, was intended to be shipped to Germany.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. They supervised all of our shipments to all the countries of northern Europe.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And, in fact, rationed food supplies to all the neutral countries of Europe.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So they did.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. So, as a matter of fact, our commerce and the commerce of the entire neutral world was dominated and absolutely controlled by belligerents.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And they rationed it to such an extent that I was told when I was in Stockholm that they were obliged there to rely on bread made in very considerable part of the bark of trees; and the wife of one of the leading officers of the Government, whom I sat next to at dinner, told me that her youngest child had lost two years of growth by reason of malnutrition consequent upon the inability to get food in Sweden during the war.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. So this question of control of commerce in time of war involves the question of starving the population not only of belligerent or enemy countries but also of the entire civilized world.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of all neutral countries through which any possible economic advantage might inure to the enemy country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think it is fair to say, however, that when the United States entered the war we were exceedingly solicitous in preventing shipments from the United States, of foodstuffs or otherwise, destined for neutral countries, from reaching, through those neutral countries, Germany; and we sought, as I recall, to interdict shipments to neutral countries until we got an agreement from them that those shipments should not go through to Germany.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is quite right; but a little confusion may arise from his statement. We put restrictions upon our own people. Of course we had a perfect right to do that. We would not allow shipments to go out of this country to neutral countries except as we permitted it; but, of course, that is an undoubted exercise of the right of sovereignty. That is quite a different thing from having goods seized by a belligerent, contrary to our will, when the goods are upon the high seas. Of course we are at liberty to put any restrictions we choose upon the export of goods from our own country during a time of war.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, after we entered the war did we acquiesce in the principle contended for by Great Britain?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We did; and not only that, but we went on and helped the British carry out just exactly that policy—a circumstance to be adverted to directly.

It may be recalled that no little embarrassment to American industry and trade resulted from the inability to get dyestuffs from Germany.

The appendix includes a long list of ships, over 300 in number, laden, in the main, with agricultural products, consigned to Scandinavian ports, that were either diverted by British authorities into Kirkwall or were ordered therein by their owners in anticipation of such direction.

Without further reference to the document mentioned, I ask that the note of Secretary Lansing of October 21, 1915, and the appendix thereto, be printed as a supplement to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On the 31st day of December, 1914, I gave to the Senate information concerning the seizure of copper aggregating 19,350 tons, the property of American citizens or shipped by them, taken from 31 ships, 4 destined to Holland, 14 to Italy, and 13 to Sweden. Of the aggregate, 9,350 tons were piled up at Gibraltar. My attention was called at the time to the seizure of $57,000 worth of sausage casings, shipped from Chicago to Copenhagen, which port, being of a neutral country, of course, the British Government had no right to blockade—a principle which the English prize courts themselves have announced—nor had it any right to treat such a commodity as contraband.

Mention of that particular case, and of the detention of cargoes consigned to Scandinavian ports, prompts notice of paragraph 20 of Mr. Lansing's note, as follows:

(20) Moreover, it is an essential principle which has been universally accepted that a blockade must apply impartially to the ships of all nations. This was set forth in the declaration of London, is found in the prize rules of Germany, France, and Japan, and has long been admitted as a basic principle of the law of blockade. This principle, however, is not applied in the present British "blockade," for, as above indicated, German ports are notoriously open to traffic with the ports of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. So strictly has this principle been enforced in the past that in the Crimean War the judicial committee of the privy council, on appeal, laid down that if belligerents themselves trade with blockaded ports they can not be regarded as effectively blockaded. (The Franciska, Moore, P. C., 56.) This decision has special significance at the present time, since it is a matter of common knowledge that Great Britain exports and reexports large quantities of merchandise to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland, whose ports, so far as American commerce is concerned, she regards as blockaded.

The concluding sentence of the paragraph just quoted recalls like comment in the message of President Madison, heretofore referred to, as follows:

It has become, indeed, sufficiently certain that the commerce of the United States is to be sacrificed, not as interfering with the belligerent rights of Great Britain, not as supplying the wants of her enemies, which she herself supplies, but as interfering with the monopoly which she covets for her own commerce and navigation. She carries on a war against the lawful commerce of a friend that she may the better carry on a commerce with an enemy, a commerce polluted by forgeries and perjuries, which are for the most part the only passports by which it can succeed. (Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol, 1, p. 502.)

The Lansing note of October 21, 1915, was in the nature of a review of repeated protests on the part of our Government, dating from shortly after hostilities began. As early as December 26, 1914, Secretary Bryan—whose pacific disposition has been so often commented on, and whose reputation as a man of peace rests upon the firmest foundation—sent a vigorous note to Page, with instructions to communicate it in substance to the British Foreign Office, in which he said:

The Government of the United States has viewed with growing concern the large number of vessels laden with American goods destined to neutral ports in Europe which have been seized on the high seas, taken into British ports, and detained sometimes for weeks by the British authorities. * * *

Articles listed as absolute contraband, shipped from the United States and consigned to neutral countries, have been seized and detained on the ground that the countries to which they were destined have not prohibited the exportation of such articles. Unwarranted as such detentions are, in the opinion of this Government, American exporters are further perplexed by the apparent indecision of the British authorities in applying their own rules to neutral cargoes. For example, a shipment of copper from this country to a specified consignee in Sweden was detained because, as was stated by Great Britain, Sweden had placed no embargo on copper. On the other hand, Italy not only prohibited the export of copper but, as this Government is informed, put in force a decree that shipments to Italian consignees or "to order," which arrived in ports of Italy can not be exported or transshipped. The only exception Italy makes is of copper which passes through that country in transit to another country. In spite of these decrees, however, the British Foreign Office has thus far declined to affirm that copper shipments consigned to Italy will not be molested on the high seas. Seizures are so numerous and delays so prolonged that exporters are afraid to send their copper to Italy, steamship lines decline to accept it, and insurers refuse to issue policies upon it. In a word, a legitimate trade is being greatly impaired through uncertainty as to the treatment which it may expect at the hands of the British authorities. * * *

Not only is the situation a critical one to the commercial interests of the United States but many of the great industries of this country are suffering because their products are denied long-established markets in European countries, which, though neutral, are contiguous to the nations at war. Producers and exporters, steamship and insurance companies are pressing, and not without reason, for relief from the menace to trans-Atlantic trade which is gradually but surely destroying their business and threatening them with financial disaster.

In a later note of date March 30, 1915, Mr. Bryan, referring to an order in council proclaiming a blockade, said:

But the novel and quite unprecedented feature of that blockade, if we are to assume it to be properly so defined, is that it embraces many neutral ports and coasts, bars access to them, and subjects all neutral ships seeking to approach them to the same suspicion that would attach to them were they bound for the ports of the enemies of Great Britain and to unusual risks and penalties.

It is manifest that such limitations, risks, and liabilities placed upon the ships of a neutral power on the high seas, beyond the right of visit and search and the right to prevent the shipment of contraband already referred to, are a distinct invasion of the sovereign rights of the nation whose ships, trade, or commerce is interfered with.

Another order in council subjected to seizure any goods of enemy origin. Touching this order, Secretary Lansing wired to Ambassador Page on July 15, 1915, to the effect that he is instructed—to reiterate the position of the Government of the United States as set forth in the department's instruction of March 30, 1915, with respect to the order in council mentioned, the international invalidity of which the Government of the United States regards as plainly illustrated by the present instance of the seizure of American-owned goods passing from the neutral port of Rotterdam to a neutral port of the United States merely because the goods came originally from territory in the possession of an enemy of Great Britain.

In that case a ship carrying goods of an American citizen bought in Belgium was overhauled, brought into London, and required to discharge the freight mentioned because, forsooth, it was produced in Germany.

It is not to be understood that the British Government admitted its wrongdoing in any of its acts complained of or confessed the illegality of the general course pursued by it. When, after prolonged delay, it replied to the challenge of our State Department, it usually had some plausible excuse to offer, not infrequently advancing for its departure from the practice sanctioned by international law that the American Government had during our Civil War in like manner introduced innovations in the law in respect to the rights of neutrals, particularly with respect to "continuous voyages." American journals have reiterated the claim so made as though it were an accepted and indisputable fact, whereas the truth is that even with respect to the doctrine of "continuous voyage" our Supreme Court but followed rules long since established by the English prize courts.

It is not without significance in this connection that the English Government has effected a settlement with all but a very few of the American claimants alleging damages by reason of illegal seizures or detentions, while the prize court adjudications sustaining them on evidence of a substantial character have been notably few.

It was the long train of lawless and exasperating encroachments upon our rights to carry on commerce with neutral nations, briefly referred to, as well as our historic attitude touching trade with neutrals, that induced President Wilson to enunciate a guarantee of the "freedom of the seas" as one of the ends to be attained through the treaty of peace terminating the World War, a feature of the celebrated 14 points from which Great Britain withheld her approval.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. With all the protests that were made by the American ambassador during that time—and he was constantly protesting at the request of his Government——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And according to his book, the English Government did not pay any attention to the protests.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator know of a single instance when a protest on the part of the Government of the United States was successful in any way?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not followed the matter in detail, but I presume that a good many of the ships which were turned into Kirkwall and were sent to London and held there without any just cause were afterwards released. Whether that was due to a wired protest or not, of course, I do not know.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I meant a protest made on the basis of certain principles involved which were never yielded to by the British Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think that the illegality of the seizures upon established principles of law was ever acknowledged. I might say that my information is that the negotiations have resulted in an agreement, which may reach the Senate, providing that the balance of the claims shall be offset against the claims of Great Britain arising out of obligations incurred by the Navy for supplies and one thing or another of that kind.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand, in the adjustment of these neutral claims, the adjustment agreement provides that neither Government recedes from the position which it took during the war.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is my understanding.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The fact remains that we did not enforce our rights as neutrals at the time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We did not.

Mr. WHEELER. If we had, we would have gone to war with Great Britain.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We did not because meanwhile the German submarine campaign was inaugurated, and American lives were lost, and, of course, everybody very properly said, "This matter of loss of property, the seizure of some ships, is a trifling thing compared with the destruction of human lives," and all public thought was directed against, not the breaches of our rights by Great Britain but the graver breach of our rights by Germany. So the public lost sight of the former entirely.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The fact that food made contraband and was being rationed to neutral countries in order to keep it out of Germany was used as an excuse by the German Government for opening its submarine campaign, which finally got us into the war.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That was offered by them as a reason why Great Britain was not observing the principles of international law, and there was no reason why they should.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me further, that might lead to the conclusion that if a nation does not protect its rights as a neutral between belligerents in time of war, one of the belligerents may accuse the Government of the United States of not maintaining its neutrality, and may therefore act in such a way that we will be brought into the war, as we were in the last war.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We were in that situation in the last war, and we were in that situation in the early part of the nineteenth century. France was continually complaining that we did not resist the breaches by Great Britain, and Great Britain was complaining because we did not resist the encroachments of our rights by the French Government, and for a long time it was a question as to whether we should go into the war upon the side of France or upon the side of Great Britain.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. DILL. If we had attempted to enforce our rights against England, undoubtedly it would have led to war.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly; and the sentiment of the country at that time was against our going to war against Great Britain, the sympathies of the people of this country being generally with the Allies rather than with Germany.

Mr. DILL. Her orders practically forbade our ships going into the North Sea.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That was the effect of them.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Permit me to ask the Senator another question on which I would like to have his opinion. Has the Senator any idea that the fact that the Allies were piling up their paper in our banks here, to the amount of about $5,000,000,000 when we entered the war, had anything to do with our failing to insist upon our rights as a neutral in protecting our commerce?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I presume that was a consideration that withheld us in coming to conclusions with Great Britain about these infractions.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I ask these questions in order to bring out all of the possible factors that may get a nation into war and that may enter into the question of enforcing our neutrality and our rights as neutrals.

I shall not disturb the Senator further, except to say that if Germany had borrowed money here as the Allies did, there would possibly have been some incentive on our part to maintain our rights and insist upon our rights for the protection of the commerce we had with Germany. If I am not mistaken, the financing of the Allies in this country reached such a stage that on the 5th of March, 1917, Mr. Page, American ambassador to Great Britain, wrote a letter to President Wilson in which he said he thought that there would be a financial crash and panic unless we went into the war; that the Morgans could not finance the Allies any longer; that the proposition was too much for private banking concerns; and that the United States Government had to go into the war in order to help finance the Allies.

Mr. BORAH. Is that letter public?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; it is in Mr. Page's letters.

Mr. BORAH. Is that the purport of the letter?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us get the letter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the Senator from Montana proceeds, will he state whether he takes the position that as neutrals in time of war we should not have a sufficient Navy to protect our commerce?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I take the contrary position. I have just stated that each nation ought to have a navy adequate for the protection of its commerce——

Mr. McKELLAR. At any time?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. When it is a neutral.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would mean a navy adequate to protect its commerce and trade at any time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator entirely about that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Lest any misapprehension should arise with respect to that, I want to call attention to the fact that in determining the size of the Navy we must take into consideration the navy of a possible antagonist, and if the possible antagonist will only reduce its navy, we may reduce ours likewise.

Mr. McKELLAR. Indeed, but when the possible antagonist is continuing to build its navy while we are not building, it seems to me it would leave us in the attitude of not being able to protect our trade and commerce should war arise and we remain neutral.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before I get through I shall have something to say upon that question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would be more enlightening to the Senate, if I might make the suggestion, if both the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Tennessee would state clearly, because this is a practical question, to what antagonist they refer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have endeavored to state. I stated in the initial sentence in this address that we are building in contemplation of a war primarily with Great Britain, and secondarily with Japan.

Mr. NORRIS. That makes it plain. I would like to know whether the Senator from Tennessee has the same idea.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not know why we should use any cryptic language in discussing this matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Nor do I. That is why I asked the question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would like to get it down to a concrete proposition. We do not need our Navy to protect our commerce when the world is at peace. We need a navy to protect our commerce only when there is war, and our Navy is now altogether adequate to protect our commerce against any country in the world except one of these two.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator in his reference to the Navy in time of peace, although that is a direct contradiction of the position taken by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and by the ranking Member on the other side, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who both proclaimed many times, in the course of their able arguments, that we needed a navy in time of peace just the same as in time of war.

Mr. McKELLAR. Fortunately in the Senate we can take our own positions, and we are very fortunate indeed if we can defend the position which we ourselves take without having to subscribe to the views of some one else.

Mr. NORRIS. We very seldom get all to agree, that is true.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is very hard to do.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, if we did not have a navy in time of peace we would not have any in time of war, because we do not have time to prepare for war after a war starts.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true, but the use of the Navy in time of peace has been advocated as an absolute necessity.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The intensity of feeling in the United States concerning the outrages to which our commerce was subjected in the war in which Britain was engaged against the Central Powers is not unappreciated by those who have given thought to the matter among her subjects.

In the article in the London Observer, heretofore referred to by its able editor, J. L. Garvin, also the editor of the revised Encyclopedia Britannica, is the following highly significant paragraph:

> But behind the naval question is the political question. The two countries will have to face together an old problem in new form—the "freedom of the seas." If you can settle that, you will settle everything. If you can not settle that, you will settle nothing. The traditional British practice of interception and search as regards neutral vessels in time of war never can be exercised in the future in the case of the United States. Nothing is more absolutely certain than this. American conviction on this point has never changed for a century and a half. What they felt when they were first an independent nation of 4,000,000 they feel now when they are a nation of 120,000,000, far richer, head for head, than any other people that has existed and with a vigour quite equal to their numbers.

It is the memory of the wrongs so perpetrated, the determination to prevent a repetition of them, and the dread of a conflict should Britain attempt in some future war in which she may be involved to pursue what is referred to in the Garvin article as her "traditional practice" that give strength to the demand for the pending legislation to expand our Navy and to the conviction, in which I share, that entire parity, so far as that can be secured, as between the navies of the two countries should obtain. It is the very general belief on this side of the water that if the United States had a Navy substantially equal in strength to that of Great Britain our rights would be respected by her; in other words, that a navy equal to hers would contribute materially to, if it would not be a guaranty of the preservation of peace between the two countries.

For myself, I can not think there is any likelihood whatever of a war between the United States and Great Britain, except it be precipitated by what has thus been appropriately referred to as her "traditional practice." I can think of no reason why this country should maintain a navy such as is contemplated by the pending bill except in anticipation of the pursuit of such "traditional practice." And the attitude taken at the late naval conference at Geneva by the representatives of Great Britain affords abundant ground for the belief that it is her purpose, or was at that time, to adhere to her "traditional practice."

It was a most reasonable expectation on the part of the people of the United States that our Government having, when it occupied a commanding position in 1922 freely consented, indeed proposed, to make enormous sacrifices in order to arrest competitive building and to bring about parity as between the United States and Great Britain, and actually did abandon its naval construction program pursuant to the only partially effective agreement arrived at, and scrapped ships representing an investment of approximately $300,000,000, some similar disposition would be exhibited by her when, through building permitted by the treaty, the situation of the two nations was reversed. That expectation was rudely dispelled, and dispelled in such manner as to leave the unpleasant impression that the English people, at least so far as the present ministry speaks for them, propose to preserve the command of the seas, not only to enable them to continue their "traditional practice" but to satisfy the pride with which they once sang "Britannia Rules the Wave."

I am, as heretofore stated, wedded to the idea of parity as between the United States and Great Britain, but I should like to see that parity attained by scaling down, rather than by building up. As indicated, it is my opinion that neither nation stands in need of any such naval establishment as it now maintains except to meet the contingency of war with the other. I am eager, however, to see initiated another attempt to reach an agreement for limitation of naval armament, failing which I am prepared to vote for the construction of not only 15 cruisers but for any other additions to our naval force required to put past doubt that it is at least equal in strength to the British Navy.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Does not the Senator think if we would only become a party to some general disarmament conference, say some disarmament conference held under the auspices of the League of Nations, at which the pressure of all the civilized powers of the world would be brought to bear both on our country and on Great Britain, that there would be infinitely more chance of some understanding being arrived at with reference to naval disarmament or reduction of naval armament between the United States and Great Britain, than by means of the conferences we have been holding?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is a question upon which I do not feel competent to give an answer. There are many who contend that if we were to put the matter of naval limitation into a general conference for the limitation of all armament, it would take an indefinite length of time to work it out, and that we would not get the necessary agreement concerning naval limitation. On the other hand, it is argued that we can not take one of these separately from the other and that we can not go forward with the naval conference unless at the same time we consider the question of a reduction of land armaments.

Mr. BRUCE. Then does not the Senator think it is probably true that if this country and Great Britain would enter into a general disarmament conference, it would bring some pressure to bear with reference to land armaments that we would not otherwise be able to bring to bear? In other words, in the adjustment of naval armaments between Great Britain and the United States, the two countries might agree on a radical reduction of military armaments on land.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the Senator understands that the conference for the consideration of general disarmament resumes its sessions in the month of April next.

Mr. BRUCE. I know that is so, and I am looking forward to that with hope.

I am in accord with the Senator from Idaho on the necessity of the restatement of the rules governing the rights of belligerents and neutrals on the high seas, and shall support his amendment, but, to my mind, action such as is contemplated by it looking to a conference should be accompanied by a proposal from our Government to have declared as the basic principle of such restatement, the immunity from seizure of private property on the sea.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator is arguing apparently in anticipation of a controversy arising between the United States and Great Britain about the rights of a neutral in time of war and control of the seas. If I heard the Senator correctly, he also intimated that unless an agreement in settlement of this controversy could be entered into, he agreed with the Senator from Idaho and would vote for cruisers. Is that correct?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not recall just exactly what the Senator from Idaho said, but the Senator has quite accurately stated my attitude.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator mean to say that this controversy would not be settled under article 2 of the so-called peace pact or Kellogg treaty, where the nations agree they will settle any controversy by peaceful means?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Article 2 of the peace pact does not provide for the settlement of any controversy.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it article 3?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Article 2 simply provides that the signatories will not go to war.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That they will renounce war as a national policy?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; that is the first paragraph. The second paragraph provides that the signatories will not seek the settlement of any controversy between them except by peaceful means, and accordingly one of the peaceful means of settling this controversy is the meeting of the general disarmament conference to take place in April, or any other arrangement that might be effected for the purpose of securing naval disarmament or a reduction of naval armament.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator stated that article 2 of the treaty provides that the signatories will not seek the settlement of any controversy between them except by peaceful means.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Article 2 contemplates every controversy that may possibly arise between two nations and they agree they will not seek a settlement of that controversy except by peaceful means; in other words, that they will not go to war about it.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator does not understand that section of the treaty to mean that the question of the size of the Navy of either Great Britain or the United States is such a controversy that they agree to settle it by peaceful means? In the very nature of things it is settled by peaceful means. The building of a ship is a peaceful pursuit although the object of building it may not be always peaceful. The very act of building up a navy is a peaceful pursuit. I do not understand that section 2 of the Kellogg treaty contemplates a controversy over the size of the different navies.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I remind the Senator of the exact language of article 2 which, as I recollect it, is that solution or settlement of any dispute or controversy with any nation, whatever its nature or origin, shall never be sought except by pacific means.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the Senator is quite accurate.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I was trying to bring out under what article of the peace treaty we intend to use these cruisers? If a question of controversy over the rights of neutrals or the right of our commerce in time of war becomes a controversy of international importance, and if we can settle it under article 2 of the peace treaty, what are the cruisers for? That is one question I have not had answered satisfactorily.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, Madison took the position in his recommendation to Congress that Great Britain had actually made war upon the United States by seizing our vessels upon the high seas without any justification whatever.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And I think she had.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If she had done that, then Great Britain had violated the Kellogg pact and we were in position to take any steps we saw fit. We were released from the obligations of section 2. Whenever Great Britain makes war upon us or any other nation makes war upon us, the obligations of the treaty are at an end.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Then an interference with our commerce would be an act of war.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Many acts might be in the nature of interference with commerce that would not be war.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. For instance, she might establish a blockade and interfere with our commerce.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would not undertake to say what particular circumstances would amount to waging war against the United States. It could be very readily understood that Great Britain might seize one of our ships and bring it to port and we protest and she immediately let it go. That would not be an act of war.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator think that the controversies with Great Britain which came up at the beginning of the war could have been settled under the terms of the peace pact?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is what we have done. We have not made war upon Great Britain. We have settled that controversy or are about to settle it by peaceful means.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The fact remains that we did not protect our commerce. We did settle the question, but we did not protect our commerce. We permitted interference to continue.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is what I am trying to show.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I want to find out how that can be stopped.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall likewise endeavor to show that. I am endeavoring to show it can only be stopped by a navy equal to that of our antagonist, and I am suggesting the means by which the navies can be brought to a parity without increasing them, and that is by reducing them.

Great Britain, she asserts, must maintain a navy superior to any other to assure an uninterrupted supply of food to her people in time of war. If her ships could sail the seas without molestation, the need of a navy is reduced to a minimum. The United States needs a great navy, one equal to that of Great Britain, it is maintained, that her tremendous and constantly increasing foreign commerce may not be jeopardized when other nations become belligerents. But if American ships and others carrying American goods may proceed upon their voyages without fear of capture or detention, the problem of an American Navy becomes a relatively simple one. It would render easy the negotiation of an agreement for the limitation of naval armament by making needless overgrown establishments. It would meet the issue of competition in naval construction by removing the occasion for the use of a huge navy.

It ought to be comforting to the people of Great Britain to have removed the peril of having their food supply cut off and to their vast shipping interests to be assured that their ventures run no more risk of confiscation or harassment in time of war than in time of peace.

The advantages to Britain of the policy proposed are beyond calculation. Whether they are balanced by those that accrue from her ability to sweep the commerce of her enemy from the sea in time of war, considering the enormous burden of building and maintaining a navy adequate to that end, is for the people of that country to determine.

There are some reasons, hereafter to be adverted to, for believing that her attitude with respect to the question may, were it again presented, undergo some change. As to the United States, the proposal is not new; indeed, it may be regarded as the historic desire of this country to see accepted the policy expressed in it. Franklin proposed the insertion in the first treaty with Great Britain of a provision that all merchants or traders with their unarmed vessels employed in commerce, exchanging products of different nations, and thereby rendering the necessary conveniences and comforts of human life more easy to obtain and more general, should be allowed to pass freely unmolested. His effort was fruitless, but in the treaty of 1785 between the new Republic and Prussia, the principle was recognized, expressed in almost the identical language of Franklin. President Monroe and President Pierce each formally in official communications urged acceptance of the principle. The policy embodied in Franklin's proposal became the subject of world-wide consideration in the period immediately following the Crimean War. The treaty of Paris, by which it was brought to a close, pledged the signatories thereto to the four following principles, namely:

1. Privateering is and remains abolished.

2. The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war.

3. Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under enemy's flag.

4. Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective; that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy. (Moore's Digest of International Law, vol. 7, p. 562.)

Pursuant to the treaty, the other powers not signatories, including the United States, were invited to subscribe to the declarations thus made. The American Secretary of State, Hon. William L. Marcy, signified the willingness of our Government to join, provided the declaration abolishing privateering should be amended by adding thereto the following:

And that the private property of subjects and citizens of a belligerent on the high seas shall be exempt from seizure by the public armed vessels of the other belligerent, except it be contraband. (Id. p. 565.)

In the voluminous diplomatic correspondence which ensued and in the discussions occasioned by the American proposal, it came to be known as the "Marcy amendment." The treaty between the United States and Italy entered into in 1871 contains the following provision:

The high contracting parties agree that, in the unfortunate event of a war between them, the private property of their respective citizens and subjects, with the exception of contraband of war, shall be exempt from capture or seizure, on the high seas or elsewhere, by the armed vessels or by the military forces of either party, it being understood that this exemption shall not extend to vessels and their cargoes which may attempt to enter a port blockaded by the naval forces of either party. (Holls, Peace Conference at The Hague, p. 309.)

The American delegates to the First Hague Conference, under instructions, sought at its sessions to obtain consideration for the subject of the immunity of private property at sea, being prepared to support the principle, but without success. The effort was repeated at the Second Hague Conference when Hon. Joseph Choate, a member of the delegation, with the eloquence and forensic skill for which he was justly celebrated, made an appeal on behalf of the United States for the consideration of the policy so long advocated by his country and its acceptance by the assembled nations. There was reason to believe that at that time the opposition of Great Britain had been to some degree mollified. The subject was referred to at some length in the instructions of Sir Edward Grey to the British delegates who were directed not to offer any objection to the discussion of it at the conference. A copy of what was said in that regard is, with the consent of the Senate, printed as a further appendix to these remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit B.)

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Though, according to Colonel House, he was authorized by Mr. Wilson to say to the representatives of the British Government that if they did not accept the principle of the freedom of the seas they could "count upon the certainty of our using our present equipment to build up the strongest navy that our resources permit, and as our people have long desired," the President was evidently obliged to recede from his insistence on specific provision with respect thereto in the treaty, as he felt obliged to yield in other particulars in which his interest was profound and his hopes high.

Conceivably he had it in mind that proceeding with the construction of the "strongest navy" an adjustment could be effected with Great Britain or an accord arrived at. House leaves the impression that Wilson believed that the situation would be met by the organization of the League of Nations, but that seems improbable inasmuch as the fourteen points contemplated both the league and the guaranty of the freedom of the seas.

It is realized now that the occasion which brought forth the treaty of Versailles was most inopportune for the dispassionate consideration of the subject of the inviolability of private property at sea. The pressure exerted by the English Admiralty to bring about economic ruin in Germany was believed to have been so important a factor in finally reducing the Central Powers to submission, our Navy had joined so unreservedly with that of Great Britain in restraining trade through neutral ports likely to advantage in any wise the enemy, that the proposal had no fair chance at the conference whose work culminated in that treaty.

The development of aviation and the improvement in the construction of submarines, of whose deadly work such harrowing memories are retained, operate to present the question in quite a different light to the British public. Their fleet no longer affords the protection from attack it once did. A recent press dispatch carries the significant information that the project to tunnel the channel is about to be authorized by the House of Commons, the opposition of the military authorities, heretofore obdurate, having been withdrawn, presumably because of the relative ease with which the islands, as well as the fleet guarding them, may otherwise be made the object of attack.

It is not unimportant in this connection either that the position of Britain and the United States in the financial world has been reversed and that in the unfortunate event of the continuation of the rivalry in naval construction even now in progress, our resources are such that the cost may be met without serious embarrassment, English opinion as expressed in the London press invites a renewal of the proposal that the inviolability of private property at sea be incorporated by treaty in the law of nations. The Economist lately said:

either another world war or the abolition of the institution of "sea power" in its traditional form by free and friendly agreement between ourselves, the latest possessors, and the Americans, the next aspirants.

Modern forms of communication, the Saturday Review thinks, have modified the power residing in blockade, the abolition of which it asserts—would completely solve the problem of our overseas communications.

And it adds:

While the weapon of blockade is a danger to ourselves it has lost its value in our own hands.

I quote a few expressions from the Observer article, of which mention has been made, but the whole of it is so informative, it is written in such a generous spirit that I ask that it be printed as an additional appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit C.)

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Among other things it says—referring to the difference in the situation of the two countries at odds:

> We are only 20 miles from Europe, not 3,000. Worse. In the air age we are no longer an island at all in the old sense. The great thing is to end the friction, and the way to do it is to let America have her head * * *. The financial and technical resources of the United States are such that they could construct and sustain bigger fleets than any other two nations to-day could equip and support. We repeat again, the more utterly free the Americans feel to build as they like the less they will like to build * * *. What we could not accept under the practical conditions of 10 years ago we can accept now. Why? Because the imports of food and raw material, which are the very blood and life of the nation, would be secure in all circumstances, so far as sea power is concerned.

The epigrammatic statement of the Observer to the effect that—

> In the air age we are no longer an island—has confirmation in the remark of General Groves, of the English air force, that—> we can no longer command the narrow seas and home waters of Europe, nor can we insure, as in the past, the safe passage of our shipping through the Mediterranean.

The blunt criticism by Lord Lee of Fareham of the delegates to the Geneva Conference for their failure to arrive at an accord is an item not lightly to be disregarded in this connection, nor is the serious and generally friendly manner in which the bizarre proposal of Congressman BRITTEN was commented on by the press and statesmen of England.

I am mindful of the fact that I am occupying much the same field as that exploited in his usual masterly manner on Thursday last by the senior Senator from Idaho. The amendment then offered by him has my hearty concurrence, but I propose to supplement it in a manner which no doubt will have his concurrence, by adding to the first paragraph the clause—> on the basis of the inviolability of private property thereon—

so that the amendment will read:

> First. That the Congress favors a restatement and recodification of the rules of law governing the conduct of belligerents and neutrals in war at sea, on the basis of the inviolability of private property thereon.

I send such an amendment to the desk, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In what has been said the attitude of Great Britain only has been considered. Should she be sympathetic or at least not immovable in opposition, there is little reason to fear hostility to the principle from any other quarter. The maritime nations to which the subject is of such importance as possibly to give rise to opposition are few—the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan. The lesser powers, both maritime and interior, may all be counted on for support of the principle. Italy is already committed to it. At the First Hague Conference, Count Nigra, representing that country and speaking to the American proposal for a pact guaranteeing the immunity from seizure of private property at sea, referred to the treaty of 1871 between his country and the United States as indicating the policy of Italy and added that the Government of that country did not only proclaim its respect for private property on the high seas diplomatically but had sanctioned the principle in its laws.

There is little doubt that Japan's interest as well as her inclination would align that power with the United States in support of the principle associated with the name of Franklin. There is no reason to imagine any refractory disposition on the part of France. If Britain acquiesces an agreement would be assured that would pave the way for a further accord limiting naval armaments that would relieve all the nations concerned from the tremendous burden of taxation borne and otherwise to be borne for the construction and maintenance of huge navies. Two hundred and fifty million dollars for 15 cruisers is a relatively small sum when the vast resources of our Government are considered, but on almost any other basis it is stupendous. It means an amount which, added to the cost of maintaining them during the 20-year period of their life, at least equals the cost of the construction of the Panama Canal, regarded at the time that work was entered upon as the greatest engineering project of all time.

I am prompted to say a word in conclusion on the view so persistently advanced, with no little asperity at times, that there is some incongruity in approving the Kellogg-Briand treaty and then passing the bill before us. I do not share that view. The sponsors for the cruiser bill in the Senate are no less attached to the cause of peace than are the rest of us who may vote against the measure. They equally harbor the hope of an agreement for the limitation of naval armament. The difference is a difference of view as to how most certainly to arrive at an agreement fair and just to the United States. Not a few of those who will support the bill take that course, convinced that by so doing they aid in bringing about a conference and in getting satisfactory results from it, and that to defeat the bill will encourage the belief abroad that there is no purpose on the part of our Government in any event to build, or that should any purpose be entertained by the executive branch it can be circumvented through the spontaneous or incited opposition of the Congress. I confess that my disposition was at first to support the bill, sharing the belief that to proceed to build would lead, and that no other course would lead, to an accord, but on reflection I have convinced myself that another effort to agree may bring results, and I am eager that the trial should be made. After all it will, in all probability, make no difference whether we begin to build, if we must, this year or next year.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one question, and I might as well ask it here as at any other time.

A great deal has been said about obtaining an agreement on naval limitation. Very many people say that that can be made only on the basis of a naval alliance with Great Britain. The Senator from Montana, I take it, as well as the Senator from Idaho, does not have any agreement like that in his mind when he talks of an agreement for limitation of armament.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would not consider that as an agreement for a limitation of armament.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It has been claimed that there was in fact an alliance by which we guaranteed the status quo in the Pacific so far as Japan and Great Britain are concerned. I am not sure that I am convinced of that; but very many eminent men say that the treaty we made is in fact a naval alliance guaranteeing the status quo.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Well, let us consider the thing. We had a conference at Geneva in 1927 looking to a reduction in the naval armaments of both countries, and of Japan as well. Has anybody even intimated that those people were there engaged in negotiating a treaty in the nature of an alliance between the United States and Great Britain?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Not at that time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Have they since?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Not so far as we know. I know, however, that very many people in this country, and, I think, also in England, have looked upon the Kellogg peace treaty as the forerunner of a movement to get an alliance later for the limitation of armament, and, based upon some kind of a guaranty of other nations' territorial and other possessions, in fact, to guarantee the status quo, and that that shall be used as a basis.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I hope the Kellogg-Briand treaty will operate, as I think it will, as an indication of the spirit of these people who have a desire to reduce armaments. I do not know that it will cultivate that spirit, but I hope it will have such an effect.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Montana to what point of time is he looking forward as a point of time at which some agreement may be arrived at in relation to the reduction of British and American armaments?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should think by the time we assemble a year from now to pass appropriation bills.

Mr. BRUCE. Does the Senator mean after the next general disarmament conference has been held?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That will be in April. I do not see any reason why, if we went at it, we should not arrive at an accord by some time during the summer, if we could do so at all.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes. Then, if we did arrive at an accord that would mean, of course, that Great Britain would have to reduce her naval armament to bring it down to a level of parity with ours. Does the Senator think she would ever do that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. She would have to do practically what we did, or offered to do, in 1922. She would come forward and say, as we did then, "We are sitting on top of the world. We are ready to scale down."

Mr. BRUCE. She would have to reciprocate our generous conduct of 1921?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; and my belief is that if we could get an agreement in the first place for the immunity of private property at sea there would be no difficulty about that matter—in other words, that the occasion would be removed.

Mr. BRUCE. I see; I have the Senator's idea.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. SHORTRIDGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska. Then I will yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the last answer to the Senator from Maryland rather incites me to ask this question.

The real point in the agreement with regard to a limitation of cruisers, even though other countries were invited in, is an agreement between the United States and Great Britain. If we could agree with Great Britain, there would not be any difficulty. There is not any other nation that is coming so near to either one in point of armament, at the present time at least, that they would be considered to any great extent.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Just let me finish. But the agreement in regard to the freedom of the seas, of course, must have the acquiescence of other nations besides these two.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course.

Mr. NORRIS. So it has always seemed to me that the United States and Great Britain might very well consistently, without taking into consideration any other nation, take up the cruiser question and practically settle it; but the other proposition involved in the amendment to which the Senator has alluded would require a conference and an agreement on the part of a good many other nations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would require at least the acquiescence of all maritime nations.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I agreed to yield first to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I did not have the benefit of listening to the Senator's address, except to his concluding remarks. May I ask the Senator this question: With the information he has, does he think that Great Britain, for example, will ever agree to a reduction of her naval forces?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think that if we made an agreement for the inviolability of private property at sea she would be very glad to agree.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then, that depends upon a precedent agreement in respect to private property?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I ask the Senator—it is not to engage in controversy, but to get his present view—remembering the address of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], is the Senator from Montana of the present view that Great Britain will ever enter into any agreement in respect of contraband limiting permissible commerce to foodstuffs?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have quoted from leading London papers indicating a desire to reach an agreement with us about all these matters.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And may I infer that the Senator thinks that we would succeed in getting such an agreement?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no very definite opinion on the subject. I want to try, at least.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Well, I will express my own view later.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I see no reason why we should not try. I now yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I thank the Senator. I am much obliged to him; but we have passed the point on which I desired to question him.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if he has any reason to believe that the causes of the failure of the Geneva conference have in any wise disappeared, or that we may be any more successful in the future than we were in the last effort?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have been suggesting something that I think will make it easier to arrive at an agreement; but, even if that should not be arrived at, I rather suspect that even in Great Britain there is as keen a disappointment over the failure of it as there is in the United States, and that a further conference, like a conference between this body and the House, might result in something.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. BARKLEY. My understanding has been that one of the stumblingblocks that prevented an agreement between the United States and Great Britain in 1927 was the difference in the viewpoint of the two nations as to the particular type of cruiser necessary for the defense of each nation. For instance, Great Britain was willing to reduce cruisers of a larger tonnage because a smaller tonnage was more serviceable to her; whereas the United States was not willing to reduce larger cruisers, because that type of cruiser was more serviceable to this country than the smaller cruisers.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Has the Senator any information that would lead to the belief that at the coming April conference these two points may be solved with any greater degree of certainty than was possible in 1927?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not if the same negotiators come together again holding exactly the same views; I should expect the deadlock to continue. The Senator will remember, however, that the idea of Lord Lee was that it was a mistake to try to get naval officers to agree upon a limitation of armaments that would put a good many of them out of business.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not entirely out of sympathy with that viewpoint.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And his proposition was that if civilians were appointed to take up this matter, possibly some better results would be attained.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator think that the attitude assumed by these negotiators was contrary to the settled convictions in the two countries represented?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not prepared to say. I am prepared to say, however, that the people in this country looked quite confidently to an agreement in which, of course, the interests of the United States would be entirely safeguarded.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, then, they were disappointed that it was impossble to reach an agreement?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite so.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, is it not a fact that the British press has changed its attitude a great deal with reference to this matter since the conference failed?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not prepared to say.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question or two with regard to the doctrine of parity with Great Britain.

If we had a parity on the seas, would we not then have in all respects a very great advantage over Great Britain, since we have 3,000 miles of open line along the Canadian border, where we could easily triumph on the land?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, each country, by reason of its peculiar situation, has advantages. The United States has advantages in many ways. It is not dependent to any very appreciable extent upon other countries for its food supplies, for instance. Great Britain has a very decided advantage in her naval bases all over the world.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is not the fact of our long open line on the Canadian border a very powerful guaranty for peace with Great Britain all the time, regardless of the naval question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I so regard it, because if we were unfortunately involved in a war which would embrace Canada we have 120,000,000 people over here, and they have about ten or twelve million over there; so that it probably would not take very long for us to appropriate Canada. That undoubtedly is a guarantee of peace.

Mr. BROOKHART. Are we not in better shape to maintain our rights than England would be by merely maintaining a defensive attitude and an armament that would defend us against aggression?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I have indicated heretofore, I do not feel the least apprehension about any nation coming over here and assailing our territory. If we get into war with Great Britain, it will be because of these depredations upon our commerce when she is at war.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then if we build submarines and airships sufficient to defend our various territories, we can take care of our rights?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But that would not help us at all if depredations were made upon our commerce in the Mediterranean Sea, for instance; or, I might add, as in the late war, our commerce with the Scandinavian countries.

Mr. BROOKHART. If our commerce were attacked in the Mediterranean Sea and we were at war with Great Britain and had these 15 cruisers, we would not dare send one of them to the Mediterranean Sea.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator perhaps is better advised about that; but I am not sufficient of a naval expert to venture any opinion on that subject.

Mr. BROOKHART. The submarines and the airships together would surely get them if we did. It would not be a safe place to send them at all.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. In view of the attitude of Great Britain toward our commerce in the early part of the World War, does the Senator think, had it not been for the fact that the German submarines made attacks on some of our commerce and caused the death of American citizens, that there would have been justification for the United States going to war with Great Britain?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not like to say what would justify our going to war. I have no hesitancy in saying that upon all accepted principles we would be justified.

Mr. FRAZIER. Does the Senator remember the statement of Colonel House that was published in some of the magazines, that if it had not been for the unmerciful submarine activities of Germany the United States might have found itself on the side of the Central Powers instead of on the side of the Allies?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That might possibly have happened.

Mr. BRUCE. But the Senator from Montana does not agree with that, I am sure, because he has just referred to the very powerful sentiment running in this country in favor of Great Britain and the Allies.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. At all times.

Mr. BRUCE. In the first place, because of our natural attachment to the British and our full sympathy with the cause of the Allies generally.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that whether the United States was justified or not, I do not think there was any very great likelihood at any time that we would have gone to war against the Allies.

EXHIBIT A

THE SECRETARY OF STATE TO AMBASSADOR W. H. PAGE

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 21, 1915.

SIR: I desire that you present a note to Sir Edward Grey in the sense of the following:

(1) The Government of the United States has given careful consideration to Your Excellency's notes of January 7,[1] February 10,[1] June 22,[1] July 23,[1] July 31 (2),[1] August 13,[2] and to a note verbale of the British Embassy of August 6,[2] relating to restrictions upon American commerce by certain measures adopted by the British Government during the present war. This Government has delayed answering the earlier of these notes in the hope that the announced purpose of His Majesty's Government "to exercise their belligerent rights with every possible consideration for the interest of neutrals" and their intention of "removing all causes of avoidable delay in dealing with American cargoes" and of causing "the least possible amount of inconvenience to persons engaged in legitimate trade," as well as their "assurances to the United States Government that they would make it their first aim to minimize the inconveniences" resulting from the "measures taken by the allied governments," would in practice not unjustifiably infringe upon the neutral rights of American citizens engaged in trade and commerce. It is, therefore, a matter of regret that this hope has not been realized; but that, on the contrary, interferences with American ships and cargoes destined in good faith to neutral ports and lawfully entitled to proceed have become increasingly vexatious, causing American shipowners and American merchants to complain to this Government of the failure to take steps to prevent an exercise of belligerent power in contravention of their just rights. As the measures complained of proceed directly from orders issued by the British Government, are executed by British authorities, and arouse a reasonable apprehension that, if not resisted, they may be carried to an extent even more injurious to American interests, this Government directs the attention of His Majesty's Government to the following considerations:

(2) Without commenting upon the statistics presented by His Majesty's Government to show that the export trade of the United States has increased in volume since the war began further than to point out that the comparative values fail to take into account the increased price of commodities resulting from a state of war or to make any allowance for the diminution in the volume of trade which the neutral countries in Europe previously had with the nations at war, a diminution which compelled them to buy in other markets, I will pass directly to the matters which constitute the specific complaints of this Government.

(3) First. The detentions of American vessels and cargoes which have taken place since the opening of hostilities have, it is presumed, been pursuant to the enforcement of the orders in council, which were issued on August 20 and October 29, 1914, and March 11, 1915, and relate to contraband traffic and to the interception of trade to and from Germany and Austria-Hungary. In practice these detentions have not been uniformly based on proofs obtained at the time of seizure, but many vessels have been detained while search was made for evidence of the contraband character of cargoes or of an intention to evade the nonintercourse measures of Great Britain. The question, consequently, has been one of evidence to support a belief of—in many cases a bare suspicion of—enemy destination or occasionally of enemy origin of the goods involved. Whether this evidence should be obtained by search at sea before the vessel or cargo is taken into port, and what the character of the evidence should be, which is necessary to justify the detention, are the points to which I direct your excellency's attention.

(4) In regard to search at sea, an examination of the instructions issued to naval commanders of the United States, Great Britain, Russia, Japan, Spain, Germany, and France from 1888 to the beginning of the present war shows that search in port was not contemplated by the Government of any of these countries. On the contrary, the context of the respective instructions shows that search at sea was the procedure expected to be followed by the commanders. All of these instructions impress upon the naval officers the necessity of acting with the utmost moderation—and in some cases commanders are specifically instructed—in exercising the right of visit and search, to avoid undue deviation of the vessel from her course.

(5) An examination of the opinions of the most eminent text writers on the laws of nations shows that they give practically no consideration to the question of search in port outside of examination in the course of regular prize court proceedings.

(6) The assertion by His Majesty's Government that the position of the United States in relation to search at sea is inconsistent with its practice during the American Civil War is based upon a misconception. Irregularities there may have been at the beginning of that war, but a careful search of the records of this Government as to the practice of its commanders shows conclusively that there were no instances when vessels were brought into port for search prior to instituting prize court proceedings, or that captures were made upon other grounds than, in the words of the American note of November 7, 1914, "evidence found on the ship under investigation and not upon circumstances ascertained from external sources." A copy of the instruction issued to American naval officers on August 18, 1862, for their guidance during the Civil War is appended.

(7) The British contention that "modern conditions" justify bringing vessels into port for search is based upon the size and seaworthiness of modern carriers of commerce and the difficulty of uncovering the real transaction in the intricate trade operations of the present day. It is believed that commercial transactions of the present time, hampered as they are by censorship of telegraph and postal communications on the part of belligerents, are essentially no more complex and disguised than in the wars of recent years, during which the practice of obtaining evidence in port to determine whether a vessel should be held for prize proceedings was not adopted. The effect of the size and seaworthiness of merchant vessels upon their search at sea has been submitted to a board of naval experts, which reports that—

"At no period in history has it been considered necessary to remove every package of a ship's cargo to establish the character and nature of her trade or the service on which she is bound, nor is such removal necessary. * * *

"The facilities for boarding and inspection of modern ships are in fact greater than in former times, and no difference, so far as the necessities of the case are concerned, can be seen between the search of a ship of 1,000 tons and one of 20,000 tons—except possibly a difference in time—for the purpose of establishing fully the character of her cargo and the nature of her service and destination. * * * This method would be a direct aid to the belligerents concerned in that it would release a belligerent vessel overhauling the neutral from its duty of search and set it free for further belligerent operations."

(8) Turning to the character and sufficiency of the evidence of the contraband nature of shipments to warrant the detention of a suspected vessel or cargo for prize proceedings, it will be recalled that when a vessel is brought in for adjudication courts of prize have heretofore been bound by well-established and long-settled practice to consider at the first hearing only the ship's papers and documents, and the goods found on board, together with the written replies of the officers and seamen to standing interrogatories taken under oath, alone and separately, as soon as possible and without communication with or instruction by counsel, in order to avoid possibility of corruption and fraud.

(9) Additional evidence was not allowed to be introduced except upon an order of the court for "further proof," and then only after the cause had been fully heard upon the facts already in evidence or when this evidence furnished a ground for prosecuting the inquiry further. This was the practice of the United States courts during the War of 1812, the American Civil War, and the Spanish-American War, as is evidenced by the reported decisions of those courts, and has been the practice of the British prize courts for over a century. This practice has been changed by the British prize court rules adopted for the present war by the order in council of August 5. Under these new rules there is no longer a "first hearing" on the evidence derived from the ship, and the prize court is no longer precluded from receiving extrinsic evidence for which a suggestion has not been laid in the preparatory evidence. The result is, as pointed out above, that innocent vessels or cargoes are now seized and detained on mere suspicion while efforts are made to obtain evidence from extraneous sources to justify the detention and the commencement of prize proceedings. The effect of this new procedure is to subject traders to risk of loss, delay, and expense so great and so burdensome as practically to destroy much of the export trade of the United States to neutral countries of Europe.

(10) In order to place the responsibility for the delays of vessels and cargoes upon American claimants, the order in council of October 29, 1914, as pointed out in the British note of February 10, seeks to place the burden of proof as to the noncontraband character of the goods upon the claimant in cases where the goods are consigned "to order" or the consignee is not named or the consignee is within enemy territory. Without admitting that the onus probandi can rightfully be made to rest upon the claimant in these cases, it is sufficient for the purposes of this note to point out that the three classes of cases indicated in the order in council of October 29 apply to only a few of the many seizures or detentions which have actually been made by British authorities.

(11) The British contention that in the American Civil War the captor was allowed to establish enemy destination by "all the evidence at his disposal," citing the Bermuda case (3 Wall. 515), is not borne out by the facts of that case. The case of the Bermuda was one of "further proof," a proceeding not to determine whether the vessel should be detained and placed in a prize court, but whether the vessel, having been placed in prize court, should be restored or condemned. The same ruling was made in the case of the Sir William Peel (5 Wall. 517). These cases, therefore, can not be properly cited as supporting the course of a British captor in taking a vessel into port, there to obtain extrinsic evidence to justify him in detaining the vessel for prize proceedings.

(12) The further contention that the greatly increased imports of neutral countries adjoining Great Britain's enemies raise a presumption that certain commodities, such as cotton, rubber, and others more or less useful for military purposes, though destined for those countries, are intended for reexportation to the belligerents, who can not import them directly, and that this fact justifies the detention for the purpose of examination of all vessels bound for the ports of those neutral countries, notwithstanding the fact that most of the articles of trade have been placed on the embargo lists of those countries, can not be accepted as laying down a just or legal rule of evidence. Such a presumption is too remote from the facts and offers too great opportunity for abuse by the belligerent, who could, if the rule were adopted, entirely ignore neutral rights on the high seas and prey with impunity upon neutral commerce. To such a rule of legal presumption the Government can not accede, as it is opposed to those fundamental principles of justice which are the foundation of the jurisprudence of the United States and Great Britain.

(13) Before passing from the discussion of this contention as to the presumption raised by increased importations to neutral countries, this Government directs attention to the fact that His Majesty's Government admit that the British exports to those countries have also materially increased since the present war began. Thus Great Britain concededly shares in creating a condition which is relied upon as a sufficient ground to justify the interception of American goods destined to neutral European ports. If British exports to those ports should be still further increased, it is obvious that, under the rule of evidence contended for by the British Government, the presumption of enemy destination could be applied to a greater number of American cargoes, and American trade would suffer to the extent that British trade benefited by the increase. Great Britain can not expect the United States to submit to such manifest injustice or to permit the rights of its citizens to be so seriously impaired.

(14) When goods are clearly intended to become incorporated in the mass of merchandise for sale in a neutral country, it is an unwarranted and inquisitorial proceeding to detain shipments for examination as to whether those goods are ultimately destined for the enemy's country or use. Whatever may be the conjectural conclusions to be drawn from trade statistics, which, when stated by value, are of uncertain evidence as to quantity, the United States maintains the right to sell goods into the general stock of a neutral country, and denounces as illegal and unjustifiable any attempt of a belligerent to interfere with that right on the ground that it suspects that the previous supply of such goods in the neutral country, which the imports renew or replace, has been sold to an enemy. That is a matter with which the neutral vendor has no concern and which can in no way affect his rights of trade. Moreover, even if goods listed as conditional contraband are destined to an enemy country through a neutral country, that fact is not in itself sufficient to justify their seizure.

(15) In view of these considerations, the United States, reiterating its position in this matter, has no other course but to contest seizures of vessels at sea upon conjectural suspicion and the practice of bringing them into port for the purpose, by search or otherwise, of obtaining evidence, for the purpose of justifying prize proceedings, of the carriage of contraband, or of breaches of the order in council of March 11. Relying upon the regard of the British Government for the principles of justice so frequently and uniformly manifested prior to the present war, this Government anticipates that the British Government will instruct their officers to refrain from these vexations and illegal practices.

(16) Second. The Government of the United States further desires to direct particular attention to the so-called "blockade" measures imposed by the order in council of March 11. The British note of July 23, 1915, appears to confirm the intention indicated in the note of March 15, 1915, to establish a blockade so extensive as to prohibit trade with Germany or Austria-Hungary, even through the ports of neutral countries adjacent to them. Great Britain, however, admits that it should not, and gives assurances that it will not, interfere with trade with the countries contiguous to the territories of the enemies of Great Britain. Nevertheless, after over six months' application of the "blockade" order, the experience of American citizens has convinced the Government of the United States that Great Britain has been unsuccessful in her efforts to distinguish between enemy and neutral trade. Arrangements have been made to create in these neutral countries special consignees, or consignment corporations, with power to refuse shipments and to determine when the state of the country's resources requires the importation of new commodities. American commercial interests are hampered by the intricacies of these arrangements, and many American citizens justly complain that their bona fide trade with neutral countries is greatly reduced as a consequence, while others assert that their neutral trade, which amounted annually to a large sum, has been entirely interrupted.

(17) It makes this practice even more harassing to neutral traders that the British authorities require a consignor to prove that his shipments are not bound to an enemy of Great Britain, even when the articles are on the embargo list of the neutral country to which they are destined, and that notwithstanding the assertion in the last British note that interference with such trade by a belligerent can only take place "provided, of course, that he (the belligerent) can establish" that the commerce is with the enemy.

(18) While the United States Government was at first inclined to view with leniency the British measures which were termed in the correspondence but not in the order in council of March 11 a "blockade," because of the assurances of the British Government that inconvenience to neutral trade would be minimized by the discretion left to the courts in the application of the order in council and by the instructions which it was said would be issued to the administrative and other authorities having to do with the execution of the so-called "blockade" measures, this Government is now forced to the realization that its expectations, which were fully set forth in its note of March 30, were based on a misconception of the intentions of the British Government. Desiring to avoid controversy and in the expectation that the administration of the order in council would conform to the established rules of international law, this Government has until now reserved the question of the actual validity of the order in council of March 11, in so far as it is considered by the Government of Great Britain to establish a blockade within the meaning of that term as understood in the law and the practice of nations; but in the circumstances now developed it feels that it can no longer permit the validity of the alleged blockade to remain unchallenged.

(19) The declaration of Paris in 1856, which has been universally recognized as correctly stating the rule of international law as to blockade, expressly declares that "blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective; that is to say, maintained by force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy." The effectiveness of a blockade is manifestly a question of fact. It is common knowledge that the German coasts are open to trade with the Scandinavian countries and that German naval vessels cruise both in the North Sea and the Baltic and seize and bring into German ports neutral vessels bound for Scandinavian and Danish ports. Furthermore, from the recent placing of cotton on the British list of contraband of war, it appears that the British Government have themselves been forced to the conclusion that the blockade is ineffective to prevent shipments of cotton from reaching their enemies, or else that they are doubtful as to the legality of the form of blockade which they have sought to maintain.

(20) Moreover, it is an essential principle, which has been universally accepted, that a blockade must apply impartially to the ships of all nations. This was set forth in the declaration of London is found in the prize rules of Germany, France, and Japan, and has long been admitted as a basic principle of the law of blockade. This principle, however, is not applied in the present British "blockade," for, as above indicated, German ports are notoriously open to traffic with the ports of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. So strictly has this principle been enforced in the past that in the Crimean War the judicial committee of the privy council on appeal laid down that if belligerents themselves trade with blockaded ports they can not be regarded as effectively blockaded. (The Franciska, Moore, P. C., 56.) This decision has special significance at the present time, since it is a matter of common knowledge that Great Britain exports and reexports large quantities of merchandise to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland, whose ports, so far as American commerce is concerned, she regards as blockaded. In fact, the British note of August 13 itself indicates that the British exports of many articles, such as cotton, lubricating oil, tobacco, cocoa, coffee, rice, wheat flour, barley, spices, tea, copra, etc., to these countries have greatly exceeded the British exports of the same articles for the corresponding period of 1914. The note also shows that there has been an important British trade with those countries in many other articles, such as machinery, beef, butter, cotton waste, etc.

(21) Finally there is no better-settled principle of the law of nations than that which forbids the blockade of neutral ports in time of war. The declaration of London, though not regarded as binding upon the signatories, because not ratified by them, has been expressly adopted by the British Government without modification as to blockade in the British order in council of October 29, 1914. Article 18 of the declaration declares specifically that "the blockading forces must not bar access to neutral ports or coasts." This is, in the opinion of this Government, a correct statement of the universally accepted law as it exists to-day and as it existed prior to the declaration of London. The meaning of this statement is elucidated by Mr. Renault in the report of the drafting committee upon the convention, in which he states:

"This rule has been thought necessary the better to protect the commercial interests of neutral countries; it completes article 1, according to which a blockade must not extend beyond the ports and coasts of the enemy, which implies that, as it is an operation of war, it must not be directed against a neutral port, in spite of the importance to a belligerent of the part played by that port in supplying his adversary."

As the conference assembled at London upon the invitation of the British Government it is important to recall the instruction of Sir Edward Grey to the British delegates, "setting out the views of His Majesty's Government, founded on the decisions of the British courts," in which he says:

"A blockade must be confined to the ports and coast of the enemy, but it may be instituted of one port or of several ports or of the whole of the seaboard of the enemy. It may be instituted to prevent the ingress only or egress only, or both."

He added:

"Where the ship does not intend to proceed to the blockaded port, the fact that goods on board are to be sent on by sea or by inland transport is no ground for condemnation."

In support of this announcement Sir Edward Grey referred to several decisions of British prize courts, among which an early one of 1801 held that goods shipped from London to Emden, thense inland or by canal to Amsterdam, then blockaded by sea, were not subject to condemnation for breach of blockade. (Jonge Pieter, 4 C. R., 79.) This has been the rule for a century, so that it is scarcely necessary to recall that the Matamoros cases, well known to the British Government, support the same rule, that neutral ports may not be blockaded, though "trade with unrestricted inland commerce between such a port and the enemy's territory impairs undoubtedly, and very seriously impairs, the value of a blockade of the enemy's coast."

(22) Without mentioning the other customary elements of a regularly imposed blockade, such as notification of the particular coast line invested, the imposition of the penalty of confiscation, etc., which are lacking in the present British "blockade" policy, it need only be pointed out that, measured by the three universally conceded tests above set forth, the present British measures can not be regarded as constituting a blockade in law, in practice, or in effect.

(23) It is incumbent upon the United States Government, therefore, to give the British Government notice that the blockade, which they claim to have instituted under the order in council of March 11, can not be recognized as a legal blockade by the United States.

(24) Since the Government of Great Britain has laid much emphasis on the ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Springbok case, that goods of contraband character seized while going to the neutral port of Nassau, though actually bound for the blockaded ports of the South, were subject to condemnation, it is not inappropriate to direct attention to the British view of this case in England prior to the present war, as expressed by Sir Edward Grey in his instructions to the British delegates to the London conference in 1908:

"It is exceedingly doubtful whether the decision of the Supreme Court was in reality meant to cover a case of blockade running in which no question of contraband arose. Certainly, if such was the intention, the decision would pro tanto be in conflict with the practice of the British courts. His Majesty's Government sees no reason for departing from that practice, and you should endeavor to obtain general recognition of its correctness."

It may be pointed out also that the cimcumstances surrounding the Springbok case were essentially different from those of the present day to which the rule laid down in that case is sought to be applied. When the Springbok case arose the ports of the Confederate States were effectively blockaded by the naval forces of the United States, though no neutral ports were closed, and a continuous voyage through a neutral port required an all-sea voyage terminating in an attempt to pass the blockading squadron.

(25) Third. It appears to be the position of Great Britain that if, as the United States alleges, American citizens or American interests are directly and adversely affected by the British policies of contraband and nonintercourse, resulting in interference with ships and cargoes, they should seek redress in the prize courts which the British Government have established, and that, pending the exhaustion of such legal remedies with the result of a denial of justice, the British Government "can not continue to deal through the diplomatic channels with the individual cases."

(26) It is declared that this was the course followed by the United States during the American Civil War and the Spanish War, and that both countries have supported the practice by allowing their prize court decisions, when shown to be unjust or inadequate, to be reviewed by an international tribunal, as was done under the treaties of 1794 and 1871. The ground upon which this contention is put forth, and the results which would follow, if the course of procedure suggested were accepted, give the impression that His Majesty's Government do not rely upon its soundness or strength. Nevertheless, since it has been advanced, I can not refrain from presenting certain considerations which will show that the proposed course embodies the form rather than the substance of redress. The cases which the British Government would have claimants present to their prize courts are essentially different from cases arising wholly within the jurisdiction of a foreign country. They result from acts committed by the British naval authorities upon the high seas, where the jurisdiction over neutral vessels is acquired solely by international law. Vessels of foreign nationality, flying a neutral flag and finding their protection in the country of that flag, are seized without facts warranting a reasonable suspicion that they are destined to blockaded ports of the enemy or that their cargoes are contraband, although the possession of such facts is, by international law, essential to render a seizure legal.

The officers appear to find their justification in the orders in council and regulations of the British Government, in spite of the fact that in many of the present cases the orders in council and the regulations for their enforcement are themselves complained of by claimants as contrary to international law. Yet the very courts which, it is said, are to dispense justice to dissatisfied claimants, are bound by the orders in council. This is unmistakably indicated to be the case in the British note of July 31, which states that—

"British prize courts, according to the ancient form of commission under which they sit are to determine cases according to the course of admiralty and the law of nations and the statutes, rules, and regulations for the time being in force in that behalf."

This principle, the note adds, has recently been announced and adhered to by the British prize court in the case of the Zamora. It is manifest, therefore, that, if prize courts are bound by the laws and regulations under which seizures and detentions are made, and which claimants allege are in contravention of the law of nations, those courts are powerless to pass upon the real ground of complaint or to give redress for wrongs of this nature. Nevertheless, it is seriously suggested that claimants are free to request the prize court to rule upon a claim of conflict between an order in council and a rule of international law. How can a tribunal fettered in its jurisdiction and procedure by municipal enactments declare itself emancipated from their restrictions and at liberty to apply the rules of international law with freedom? The very laws and regulations which bind the court are now matters of dispute between the Government of the United States and that of His Britannic Majesty. If Great Britain followed, as she declares that she did, the course of first referring claimants to local remedies in cases arising out of American wars, it is presumed that she did so because of her knowledge or understanding that the United States had not sought to limit the jurisdiction of its courts of prize by instructions and regulations violative of the law and practice of nations, or open to such objection.

(27) The British note of February 10 states that the British Government in the American Civil War—

"In spite of remonstrances from many quarters, placed full reliance on the American prize courts to grant redress to the parties interested in cases of alleged wrongful capture by American ships of war and put forward no claim until the opportunity for redress in those courts had been exhausted."

The Government of the United States recalls that during the progress of that war, Great Britain, in several instances, demanded through diplomatic channels, damages for seizures and detentions of British ships alleged to have been made without legal justification. Among these may be mentioned the case of the Magicienne, the Don Jose, the Labuan, and the Saxon. Two of these cases were, at the time the demands were made, before American prize courts for adjudication. It is understood also that during the Boer War, when British authorities seized the German vessels, the Hertzog, The General, and The Bundesrath, and released them without prize proceedings, compensation for damages suffered was arranged through diplomatic channels.

(28) There is, furthermore, a real and far-reaching injury for which prize courts offer no means of reparation. It is the disastrous effect of the methods of the allied governments upon the general right of the United States to enjoy its international trade free from unusual and arbitrary limitations imposed by belligerent nations. Unwarranted delay and expense in bringing vessels into port for search and investigation upon mere suspicion has a deterrent effect upon trade ventures, however lawful they may be, which can not be adequately measured in damages. The menace of interference with legal commerce causes vessels to be withdrawn from their usual trade routes and insurance on vessels and cargoes to be refused, while exporters for the same reason are unable or unwilling to send their goods to foreign markets, and importers dare not buy commodities abroad because of fear of their illegal seizure or because they are unable to procure transportation. For such injuries there can be no remedy through the medium of courts established to adjust claims for goods detained or condemned. For specific injuries suffered by private interests prize courts, if they are free to apply the law of nations, might mete out an adequate indemnity, but for the injury to the trade of a nation by the menace of unwarranted interference with its lawful and established pursuit there can manifestly be found no remedy in the prize courts of Great Britain, to which United States citizens are referred for redress.

(29) There is another ground why American citizens can not submit their wrongs arising out of undue detentions and seizures to British prize courts for reparation which I can not pass over unnoticed. It is the manner in which British courts obtain jurisdiction of such cases. The jurisdiction over merchant vessels on the high seas is that of the nation whose flag it rightfully flies. This is a principle of the law and practice of nations fundamental to the freedom of the high seas. Municipal enactments of a belligerent power can not confer jurisdiction over or establish rules of evidence governing the legality of seizures of vessels of neutral nationality on the high seas. International law alone controls the exercise of the belligerent right to seize and detain such vessels. Municipal laws and regulations in violation of the international rights of another nation, can not be extended to the vessels of the latter on the high seas so as to justify a belligerent nation bringing them into its ports, and having illegally brought them within its territorial jurisdiction, compelling them to submit to the domestic laws and regulations of that nation. Jurisdiction obtained in such a manner is contrary to those principles of justice and equity which all nations should respect. Such practice should invalidate any disposition by a municipal court of property thus brought before it. The Government of the United States has, therefore, viewed with surprise and concern the attempt of His Majesty's Government to confer upon the British prize courts jurisdiction by this illegal exercise of force in order that these courts may apply to vessels and cargoes of neutral nationalities, seized on the high seas, municipal laws and orders which can only rightfully be enforceable within the territorial waters of Great Britain, or against vessels of British nationality when on the high seas.

(30) In these circumstances the United States Government feels that it can not reasonably be expected to advise its citizens to seek redress before tribunals which are, in its opinion, unauthorized by the unrestricted application of international law to grant reparation, nor to refrain from presenting their claims directly to the British Government through diplomatic channels.

(31) This Government is advised that vessels and cargoes brought in for examination prior to prize proceedings are released only upon condition that costs and expenses incurred in the course of such unwarranted procedure, such as pilotage, wharfage, demurrage, harbor dues, warehouseage, unlading costs, etc., be paid by the claimants or on condition that they sign a waiver of right to bring subsequent claims against the British Government for these exactions. This Government is loath to believe that such ungenerous treatment will continue to be accorded American citizens by the Government of His Britannic Majesty, but in order that the position of the United States Government may be clearly understood, I take this opportunity to inform Your Excellency that this Government denies that the charges incident to such detentions are rightfully imposed upon innocent trade or that any waiver of indemnity exacted from American citizens under such conditions of duress can preclude them from obtaining redress through diplomatic channels or by whatever other means may be open to them.

(32) Before closing this note, in which frequent reference is made to contraband traffic and contraband articles, it is necessary, in order to avoid possible misconstruction, that it should be clearly understood by His Majesty's Government that there is no intention in this discussion to commit the Government of the United States to a policy of waiving any objections which it may entertain as to the propriety and right of the British Government to include in their list of contraband of war certain articles which have been so included. The United States Government reserves the right to make this matter the subject of a communication to His Majesty's Government at a later day.

(33) I believe it has been conclusively shown that the methods sought to be employed by Great Britain to obtain and use evidence of enemy destination of cargoes bound for neutral ports and to impose a contraband character upon such cargoes are without justification; that the blockade, upon which such methods are partly founded, is ineffective, illegal, and indefensible; that the judicial procedure offered as a means of reparation for an international injury is inherently defective for the purpose; and that in many cases jurisdiction is asserted in violation of the law of nations. The United States, therefore, can not submit to the curtailment of its neutral rights by these measures, which are admittedly retaliatory, and therefore illegal, in conception and in nature, and intended to punish the enemies of Great Britain for alleged illegalities on their part. The United States might not be in a position to object to them if its interests and the interests of all neutrals were unaffected by them, but, being affected, it can not with complacence suffer further subordination of its rights and interests to the plea that the exceptional geographic positions of the enemies of Great Britain require or justify oppressive and illegal practices.

(34) The Government of the United States desires, therefore, to impress most earnestly upon His Majesty's Government that it must insist that the relations between it and His Majesty's Government be governed, not by a policy of expediency, but by those established rules of international conduct upon which Great Britain in the past has held the United States to account when the latter Nation was a belligerent engaged in a struggle for national existence. It is of the highest importance to neutrals not only of the present day but of the future that the principles of international right be maintained unimpaired.

(35) This task of championing the integrity of neutral rights, which has received the sanction of the civilized world against the lawless conduct of belligerents arising out of the bitterness of the great conflict which is now wasting the countries of Europe, the United States unhesitatingly assumes, and to the accomplishment of that task it will devote its energies, exercising always that impartiality which from the outbreak of the war it has sought to exercise in its relations with the warring nations.

I inclose as supplements to this instruction the United States Navy Order of August 18, 1862, and a statement regarding vessels detained by British authorities. These two documents should be transmitted as inclosures in your note to Sir Edward Grey.

I am, etc.,

ROBERT LANSING.

APPENDIX NO. 1

INSTRUCTIONS OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY TO FLAG OFFICERS COMMANDING SQUADRONS AND OFFICERS COMMANDING CRUISERS, RELATIVE TO THE RIGHT OF SEARCH

NAVY DEPARTMENT, August 18, 1862.

SIR: Some recent occurrences in the capture of vessels, and matters pertaining to the blockade, render it necessary that there should be a recapitulation of the instructions heretofore from time to time given, and also of the restrictions and precautions to be observed by our squadrons and cruisers.

It is essential, in the remarkable contest now waging, that we should exercise great forbearance, with great firmness, and manifest to the world that it is the intention of our Government, while asserting and maintaining our own rights, to respect and scrupulously regard the rights of others. It is in this view that the following instructions are explicitly given:

First. That you will exercise constant vigilance to prevent supplies of arms, munitions, and contraband of war from being conveyed to the insurgents, but that under no circumstances will you seize any vessel within the waters of a friendly nation.

Secondly. That while diligently exercising the right of visitation on all suspected vessels, you are in no case authorized to chase and fire at a foreign vessel without showing your colors and giving her the customary preliminary notice of a desire to speak and visit her.

Thirdly. That when that visit is made the vessel is not then to be seized without a search carefully made, so far as to render it reasonable to believe that she is engaged in carrying contraband of war for or to the insurgents, and to their ports directly or indirectly by transshipment, or otherwise violating the blockade; and that if, after visitation and search, it shall appear to your satisfaction that she is in good faith and without contraband actually bound and passing from one friendly or so-called neutral port to another, and not bound or proceeding to or from a port in the possession of the insurgents, then she can not be lawfully seized.

Fourthly. That, to avoid difficulty and error in relation to papers which strictly belong to the captured vessel, and mails that are carried, or parcels under official seals, you will, in the words of the law, "preserve all the papers and writings found on board and transmit the whole of the originals unmutilated to the judge of the district to which such prize is ordered to proceed"; but official seals, or locks, or fastenings of foreign authorities are in no case, nor on any pretext, to be broken, or parcels covered by them read by any naval authorities, but all bags or other things covering such parcels, and duly seized and fastened by foreign authorities, will be, in the discretion of the United States officer to whom they may come, delivered to the consul, commanding naval officer, or legation of the foreign government, to be opened, upon the understanding that whatever is contraband or important as evidence concerning the character of a captured vessel will be remitted to the prize court or to the Secretary of State at Washington, or such sealed bag or parcels may be at once forwarded to this department, to the end that the proper authorities of the foreign government may receive the same without delay.

You are specially informed that the fact that a suspicious vessel has been indicated to you as cruising in any limit which has been prescribed by this department does not in any way authorize you to depart from the practice of the rules of visitation, search, and capture prescribed by the law of nations.

Very respectfully,

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

APPENDIX NO. 2

STATEMENT REGARDING VESSELS DETAINED BY BRITISH AUTHORITIES

SEPTEMBER 10, 1915.

(1) Vessels whose cargoes and papers have been of such a character as to require but brief time for examination have been held in British ports, according to this Government's information, for prolonged periods, in some instances for more than a month, and then released without the institution of prize-court proceedings.

The steamer Chester, which sailed from Baton Rouge for Rotterdam with a cargo of illuminating oil, was taken into Falmouth September 21, 1914, and held November 4 of that year.

The steamer Ocean, carrying the same kind of a cargo, from New York to Rotterdam, was taken into Plymouth September 23, 1914, and similarly released November 5.

The steamer Charlois and the steamer New York, carrying similar cargoes, were taken into British ports on September 30 and October 12, 1914, respectively, and similarly released on October 27.

The steamers American and Rotterdam, carrying cargoes of oil to Rotterdam, were also detained under conditions similar to those of the vessels just mentioned in the fall of 1914.

The steamer Christian Knudsen, carrying a cargo of oil in bulk, consigned to a Danish corporation in Copenhagen, was brought into the port of Kirkwall, detained for 11 days, and then released.

Vessels carrying oil from the United States to long-established markets in Scandinavian countries have repeatedly been detained without being sent to the prize court for adjudication. Among them may be mentioned the Brindilla, the Platuria, the Wico, the Polarine, the Pioneer, the Llama, the Muskogee, and the John D. Rockefeller.

The steamer Denver, which carried a full cargo of cotton from Norfolk to Bremen, and which had been loaded under the supervision of a British consular officer, was taken into Kirkwall in January last, as the department was informed by the British Government, just to examine her papers and to verify her cargo.

The George W. Hawley was held for a month because she refused to comply with a requirement of the British authorities to discharge a single shipment, the illegal destination of which does not appear to have been disclosed by any evidence. The vessel carried a mixed cargo, including a shipment of oil. The British authorities insisted that the vessels should discharge the oil, which, the shipper represented, was consigned to one of its long-established agents in Sweden. Finally it was announced that the vessel would be released as an act of grace.

The steamer Wico was held by the British authorities last March. This Government was advised that the British minister at Stockholm had informed the Swedish Foreign Office that the vessel had arrived in a British port with a full cargo of oil for a concern in Stockholm, and that, in view of the recent seizure by a German man-of-war of the steamship Bryssel and her cargo, the British Government required complete assurances from the Swedish Government before the Wico could be allowed to proceed to destination, that she would not share the fate of the Bryssel.

Subsequently this Government was informed that the vessel had been allowed to proceed, but that the British Government felt that, in the event of further cargoes going to Stockholm being seized by German ships, the whole question of permitting oil cargoes to proceed to that destination would have to be seriously reconsidered.

The steamer Llama, carrying a cargo of oil to a Scandinavian port, was taken into Kirkwall and subsequently released on June 5 last. After departing from Kirkwall the ship was again arrested on June 6, and although the officer of the war vessel which seized the Llama apparently was shown the ship's release papers, he placed a prize crew on board and ordered the vessel to Aberdeen and thence to Leith, where she was finally released on June 12, although she could not proceed until June 15, owing to a shortage of coal.

(2) Vessels have been held until they have reconsigned their cargoes to a consignee in a neutral country designated by the British Government.

The steamer Seguranca, which carried a general cargo from New York to the Netherlands, was detained at a great loss to the owners of the vessel and to the shippers in a British port for the greater part of last April, in order that her cargo might be reconsigned to the Netherlands Oversea Trust. The manifest showed that the entire cargo was consigned to named consignees in the Netherlands and was accompanied by a certificate of the British consul general in New York, stating that the loading was supervised by his inspector and that the vessel contained no cargo other than that specified in the manifest. A large part of the cargo, consisting of fresh fruit stored in the hold of the vessel, was subject to decay with great rapidity.

A similar requirement was imposed on the steamer F. J. Lisman, which during last June was detained at London. It appears that, after a prolonged detention of the ship of over a month, representatives of the shippers were compelled to discharge both contraband and noncontraband articles, and that the captain and the shippers, finding their efforts to comply with the requirements of the British authorities hopeless, abandoned the voyage.

The steamers A. A. Raven and Vitalia, carrying articles listed as conditional contraband, were detained in a British port in March last until the goods shipped to specified consignees in Holland could be consigned to the Netherlands Oversea Trust.

The steamer Neches was detained last May for about two weeks in order that a shipment of cotton destined for Rotterdam might be consigned to the Netherlands Oversea Trust.

The steamer Zzandjik was detained last June, as the department was informed, while the British minister at The Hague made inquiries as to whether the Netherlands Oversea Trust had accepted the consignment of the cargo.

(3) Detentions have been made without evidence amounting to probable cause. The steamer Annam, which was detained at Kirkwall last April, carried a cargo of food products from the United States to Swedish ports. She was detained owing to a "suspicion," as the British Government stated, that a part of its cargo was destined for Germany.

The steamer Dronning Olga was detained at Kirkwall in April last and the cargo, which consisted of cotton and food products, was placed in the prize court on the ground, as the department was informed by the British Government, that it was "believed" that it was ultimately destined for Germany.

The steamer Hilding, which sailed from New York for Copenhagen with a general cargo consisting largely of food products, was seized and taken into Leith last April, and this Government was informed that the cargo has been seized as contraband with the expectation of holding it under the Order in Council of March 11, 1915, if the charge that the goods were contraband should fail.

Numerous similar instances might be cited.

The steamers Christian Knudsen and Platuria, carrying oil from New York to Denmark, were detained by the British authorities last fall, taken into British ports, and held until the British Government, as they stated, could make an investigation as to the destination of the cargo. Furthermore, this Government was informed that the vessels had been detained pending the receipt of guarantees from Denmark against the exportation of the cargoes, and that the orders were given for the release of the vessels on the receipt of satisfactory guarantees.

The steamer Brindilla, which sailed from New York October 13 last with a cargo of oil for Alexandria, was taken into port at Halifax and later released, as the department was informed, when the British authorities received information that the ship's cargo was expected at Alexandria.

The steamer Ambra was taken into a British port in July last, and this Government was informed that this vessel was held pending inquiries that had been instituted concerning destination of certain items of her cargo. About a week later the vessel was allowed to proceed.

In July last this Government was informed by the British Government that the prolonged detention of the oil steamers Polarine, Platuria, and Pioneer was due to the fact that his Majesty's Government's attention had latterly been drawn to the very large quantities of oil which had been shipped to Scandinavian countries during the last few months; that there had been every reason to suspect that some of the oil was destined for enemy countries; and that the arrival of the steamers in quick succession necessitated the institution of inquiries as to the ultimate destination of the oil.

The owners of these vessels and their cargoes complained to the Government of the United States against their detention, stating that the vessels carried the usual cargoes consigned in good faith to long-established subsidiaries in neutral countries, and further representing that, since supplies from Russia and Rumania had been prevented from entering Scandinavian ports, a large increase of business with them had been expected, but it had been found that during the first five months of the year 1915 total shipments of all petroleum products to these countries were less than for the same period last year, although business in previous years had steadily increased.

(4) Vessels have been held, according to statements of the British Government, because of the manner in which shipments have been consigned.

The steamer Einerjarl was brought into Kirkwall last May and its cargo of cottonseed cake, shipped from Newport News to Denmark, which the shippers represented was to be used exclusively for consumption in Denmark, was seized. This Government was informed that the cargo was discharged because it was consigned "to order."

The steamers Alfred, Nobel, Bjorstjerne, Bjornsen, and Friedland were seized last autumn because their cargoes were consigned "to order."

The shipments on the steamers America and Artemis have been placed in prize court under the order in council of March 11, 1915, because, the goods being consigned by the shippers to themselves, there was no guarantee of their ultimate destination.

(5) Goods have been seized by the British Government on the ground, as this Government has been informed, that the country to which they were shipped had not prohibited their export.

In the fall of the year 1914 copper shipped from the United States to Sweden on the steamers Francisco, Antares, Idaho, Tyr, and Toronto was seized by the British authorities because, as the British Government stated, the Swedish Government had not yet prohibited the reexportation of copper from Sweden.

A consignment of rubber on the Swedish ship Zamora had been placed in prize court last January because, as the British Government stated, of the absence of a comprehensive prohibition on the exportation of rubber in all its forms from Denmark.

(6) The British authorities have repeatedly seized articles classified as contraband, articles classified as conditional contraband, as well as noncontraband goods, shipped to Scandinavian countries to the Netherlands and to Italy, then neutral, although the reexportation of such commodities from these countries had been forbidden.

In December last the steamer Tellus was ordered to discharge a shipment of copper shipped from New York directly to a consignee in Milan, Italy, although by an Italian decree of November 13, 1914, the exportation of goods shipped in this manner was forbidden.

The steamer Joseph W. Fordney was seized 4 miles off the coast of Norway and, in charge of a prize crew, brought into Kirkwall April 8 last. The ship's manifest showed that the cargo consisted entirely of cattle fodder consigned to a person in Malmo, Sweden. It appeared from information presented to this Government that an affidavit regarding the character and destination of the cargo, made by the shipper of the entire cargo, was attached to the bill of lading, and that this affidavit contained a certification by the British consul general and Swedish consul and also a statement by the latter to the effect that the exportation from Sweden of the goods of which the cargo consisted was prohibited. The vessel was brought into a British port and her cargo discharged. This Government was informed by the British Government that, apart from the uncertainty of the address of the consignee of the cargo of this vessel, His Majesty's Government had evidence that the cargo was not destined for bona fide Swedish consumption but was intended for Germany.

Numerous other similar instances might be cited, including those of the detention of vessels carrying oil to Scandinavian ports which have been mentioned.

(7) Detentions have been made pending assurances that embargoed goods would be allowed to pass through a neutral country to Great Britain's allies.

The steamer Leelanaw, which carried a cargo of cotton from Galveston to Gothenburg for transshipment to Moscow, was detained in a British port early in June last. Relative to the detention of this vessel the British foreign office said:

"In view of the fact that cotton has now been placed on the Swedish prohibition of export list, His Majesty's Government have not considered it advisable to allow this large cargo to go on to Gothenburg until they are assured that there is a fair chance of it reaching its declared ultimate destination."

After nearly a month's detention the vessel was released on the understanding that she should proceed directly to Archangel.

The steamers Jentland and Syrius appear to have been recently detained under circumstances similar to those of the steamer Leelanaw.

(8) From time to time this Government has been informed of the seizure of cargoes on the ground that consignees have been known to trade with the enemy or because they were suspected of doing so.

In January last this Government was advised by the British Government that the British Government had been compelled to place in prize court a consignment of rubber on board the Swedish vessel Zamora, the consignee of these goods being regarded with grave suspicion, and there being reason to believe that the ultimate destination of the rubber was the enemy forces.

(9) Vessels have been seized and brought into port and have been required by the British authorities to pay pilotage, harbor, unlading, warehouse, storage or other dues, costs, and expenses in advance of a judicial determination of the validity of the seizure of vessel or cargo.

Instances of such treatment of vessels may be found in the cases of the detention of the steamer Neches last May, the Ogeechee, which was seized last April, and the Antilla, which was seized in February last and subjected to a prolonged detention. In the case of the last-mentioned ship, it appears, however, that the cost of discharging was borne by the British Government.

(10) Detentions of vessels proceeding from European ports:

The steamer Ogeechee, which left Bremen April 3 last for the United States, was detained at Sharpness and compelled to discharge its entire cargo, which consisted of approximately 200 shipments of goods urgently needed by American citizens. In most if not all cases it appears that ownership of these goods at the time of the seizure had passed to American consignees. In many instances American citizens had contracted for the sale of the goods consigned to them and were prevented from carrying out their contracts.

The release of shipments on the vessel has been allowed on the production of proofs of American ownership of the goods prior to March 11, 1915. American consignees in order to avoid loss have endeavored to comply with the requirements in the presentation of proofs.

The steamer Neches, which sailed from Rotterdam to the United States, was brought to London and compelled, in June last, to discharge cargo on the ground, apparently, that the goods originated partly in Belgium. The vessel was detained about a month and, after having been damaged to the extent of approximately £1,500 as a result of a collision with another vessel while under the control of the British Admiralty, and after having been involved in litigation growing out of such collision, was allowed to proceed.

The following is a list of the vessels detained prior to March 11 last, among which are some regarding the detention of which details have been briefly stated in this memorandum:

Platuria, Brindilla, John D. Rockefeller, Kroonland, Noorham, Rotterdam, Sandefjord, Thomas J. Fordney, Fram, Edward Pierce, Ellen, Tellus, Sif, Kim, Canton, Ogeechee, Friedland, Gallileo, Uller, Verona, Zuiderdijk, Greenbrier, Herm, Arkansas, Ascot, Carolyn, Breiford, Bergensfjord, Bjornstjerne, Bjornsen, Ida Cuneo, Kentucky, General Minetonka, General Caloric, Denver.

The following is an incomplete list of vessels carrying American cargoes which, sailing in practically all instances from American to Scandinavian ports, were diverted by British authorities to the port of Kirkwall, or called at that port under instructions from owners, from March 11, 1915, to June 17, 1915:

(C) THE PRIVATE PROPERTY OF BELLIGERENTS AT SEA

18. It is probable that a proposal will be brought before The Hague Conference to sanction the principle of the immunity of enemies' merchant ships and private property from capture at sea in time of war. His Majesty's Government have given careful consideration to this question, and the arguments on both sides have been fully set out in the various papers which have been at your disposal. They can not disregard the weighty arguments which have been put forward in favor of immunity. Anything which restrains acts of war is in itself a step toward the abolition of all war, and by diminishing the apprehension of the evils which war would cause removes one incentive to expenditure upon armaments. It is also possible to imagine cases in which the interests of Great Britain might benefit by the adoption of this principle of immunity from capture.

19. But, on the other hand, it must be remembered that the principle if carried to its logical conclusion must entail the abolition of the right of commercial blockade. Unless commercial blockade is discontinued there will be constant interference with an enemy's ships and constant disputes as to what constitutes an effective blockade. And when such disputes have once arisen between belligerent powers it is obvious that the one which considers itself aggrieved by the application of commercial blockade to any of its ports would cease to respect the immunity of the merchant ships and private property of its enemy wherever they were to be found. It seems to them, therefore, that it is impossible to separate this question of immunity from capture from that of commercial blockade, and that the question to which His Majesty's Government have to apply themselves is whether they should agree to a proposal which would deprive the British Navy in time of war of the right of interfering with an enemy's merchant ships or property and of the power of commercial blockade.

20. The British Navy is the only offensive weapon which Great Britain has against continental powers. The latter have a double means of offense, they have their navies and they have their powerful armies. During recent years the proportion between the British Army and the great continental armies has come to be such that the British Army operating alone could not be regarded as a means of offense against the mainland of a great continental power. For her ability to bring pressure to bear upon her enemies in war Great Britain has, therefore, to rely on the navy alone. His Majesty's Government can not therefore authorize you to agree to any resolution which would diminish the effective means which the navy has of bringing pressure to bear upon an enemy.

21. You should, however, raise no objection to the discussion of this question of immunity from capture at the conference, nor should you refuse to participate in it, nor need you necessarily take the initiative in opposing a resolution if brought forward. If at some future date the great continental armies were to be diminished and other changes favorable to the diminution of armaments were to take place, the British Government might be able to reconsider the question. If, for instance, nations generally were willing to diminish their armaments, naval and military, to an extent which would materially relieve them from the apprehension of the consequences of war, and by rendering aggression difficult would make war itself improbable; and if it became apparent that such a change could be brought about by an agreement to secure this immunity from capture at sea under all circumstances, and was dependent upon it, the British Government might feel that the risks they would run by adhering to such an agreement and the objections in principle now to be urged against it would be outweighed by the general gain and relief which such a change would bring. But at the present time they are unable to assent to a resolution which might, under existing conditions, so limit the prospective liability of war as to remove some of the considerations which now restrain public opinion from contemplating it, and might, after the outbreak of war, tend to prolong it.

THE KEY OF THE WORLD—ANGLO-AMERICAN RELATIONS—A FRESH START—CRUISERS AND SEA LAW—EUROPE AND THE ISSUE

By J. L. Garvin

There is, happily, every chance for a fresh start in Anglo-American affairs. The last few days in Europe have shown like a searchlight how absolutely vital it is that the opportunity should be used. We dwell upon it for mingled reasons, encouraging as regards the other side of the Atlantic, grave as regards our own. Our chief reason is this—that never since the war and the Paris conference has it been clearer than at this moment that Anglo-American relations are by no means a question by themselves, however momentous in that character. They are the question bound to decide for good or evil the future of the world.

If these two English-speaking peoples, with the same great mother tongue; with an unsurpassable literature in common; with so much of kindred blood between them, no matter how high you put the proportion and value of other racial elements in the United States; with countless private friendships between their citizens in spite of the breadth of the ocean—if these two can not set a lasting example of good understanding, what reasonable hope could exist for agreement between other nations? Without the surety of Anglo-American peace, there can be no surety for peace anywhere. Without a definite and cordial adjustment of the matters in doubt between London and Washington concerning naval armaments and the future of sea law, no plan of disarmament in Europe can make the slightest real progress toward success. We repeat that it is the decisive question of the world.

I. SIR AUSTEN AND MR. HOUGHTON

Sir Austen Chamberlain has returned to his post and Mr. Houghton to his. The Foreign Secretary has received the ungrudging congratulations of friends and opponents on his restoration to good health and spirits. The American ambassador holds what is now the most important diplomatic office of its kind in any capital. Whether for our own sakes or for his, we can not pretend to be sorry that he missed election to the Senate in the recent campaign. At this juncture in the world's business Providence evidently had another opinion of where the biggest work was to do. Mr. Houghton does not wear his heart upon his sleeve, and it is possible that his reserve has sometimes been misunderstood.

But it is simply true to say that in this country the longer we know him the better we like him; and we venture to think it not improbable that he feels the corresponding idea about us. Mr. Houghton's return to his embassy is one asset.

Sir Austen's fresh opportunity is another—now that the recent Anglo-French idea is forever dead. The Foreign Secretary played a memorable part at Locarno. He has helped signally to make the League of Nations more than ever the rendezvous, not of secondary personages, but of principal statesmen. His Chinese policy, confronted at the beginning with circumstances of extreme difficulty and danger, has been a masterly piece of quiet, firm, and sympathetic handling—one of the ablest and wisest achievements of its kind that ever was set down to the credit of any Foreign Minister. We have said this before, and the advance of events since enables us to repeat it more confidently now. But at the same time the final verdict upon any British statesman at the Foreign Office in our day must depend on whether he makes Anglo-American relations still better than he found them or leaves them worse.

II. REMINISCENCES

He does not need to be reminded of several things in his great father's life. For Joseph Chamberlain, almost as much as for John Bright, friendship with America, was from beginning to end the first principle of foreign policy. In the Venezuelan controversy his private visit to the United States did much to bring about the happy solution of a crisis menacingly opened. Afterwards, when British diplomacy was in danger for a few days of making a false step at the beginning of the Cuban war, the then Colonial Secretary's instant and vigorous sagacity did much to swing our policy into the right line. If his idea of a close accord between America, Britain, and Germany could have been realized, it would have saved the peace of the world. His son, as matters stand now, has both a greater obligation and a bigger chance. How he uses it, one way or the other, will determine judgment upon his career in the sight of history. For this matter of friendship or friction, concord or discord within the English-speaking world, is a historic issue if ever there was one.

III. CLEARING THE AIR

The sequence of events in the last few weeks is instructive. Everyone who knows anything about President Coolidge knows that he means justice and nothing else. The vast majority of the American people mean the same. The vast majority of the British people mean the same. But when the President spoke his tone was like that of an articulate iceberg appearing in southward waters and refrigerating the air for leagues around. For the time it chilled the hearts of those in this country who have been the staunchest friends of America through thick and thin. That we are by no means a perfect nation is what we are accustomed to tell the world. We are more given to self-criticism than any country. Our postwar difficulties are beyond comparison more complex and heavy than those with which the American Government has to deal. In consequence it is often and inevitably harder for America to understand our point of view than for us to understand hers. We are only 20 miles from Europe, not 3,000. Worse. In the air age we are no longer an island at all in the old sense.

But we know that we are in heart and intention an honest and a reasonable people. We did not recognize ourselves in the picture of motive that Mr. Coolidge seemed to suggest. Our irritable patriots replied. Their retorted suggestions about the President and the American policy were like caricature dotted out in pin pricks. It was not a pretty moment.

It was soon redeemed. On both sides the best journals showed admirable temper. Doctor Flexner's proposal for a nonofficial conference of distinguished minds was taken up widely both in this country and America. More will be heard of it. About 10 days ago Lord Lee declared in effect that the whole trouble could be settled by two men over a table. His friendship with Roosevelt and experience at the Washington conference when he was First Lord of the Admiralty give him as good a title as any man alive to be heard on this subject. He was heard. Journals like the New York Times and the New York World responded with frank good will and straight argument. Next came something unexpected. Mr. FRED BRITTEN, who is not only a Member of the House of Representatives but chairman of its Naval Committee, and had hitherto been supposed to be an arch advocate of armaments at any price, cabled direct to Mr. Baldwin the remarkable proposal that the question should be discussed by a joint parliamentary conference meeting in Canada. This hearty move made an excellent moral impression amongst ourselves. But for technical reasons, as touching the President's prerogative, it was neither authorized nor approved by the American Executive. The Prime Minister's position was delicate in these circumstances, but he has done the exact right thing. It was announced in the newspapers yesterday that Mr. Baldwin's courteous reply to Mr. BRITTEN will be communicated in the first instance to the American Secretary of State.

IV. THE REVOLUTION IN SEA POWER

This rapid improvement of feeling and atmosphere is what Sir Austen Chamberlain finds on his return. But right sentiment by itself is no solution in this affair. It must be followed up by right reason. We have to deal with practical problems. They are perfectly manageable and adjustable, but they are the biggest problems of their kind that have ever arisen in the English-speaking world; and nothing but compromise and concession can settle them. There are two very different aspects. The chief question is not that of cruisers. Behind it lies a greater and wider issue—the American conception of the freedom of the seas and of the future of sea law.

As for large cruisers, there is only one way out, and the sooner it is taken the better. Let the American Government build as many as she desires without criticism, jealousy, or worry on our side. Let her build the 15 which her naval experts regard as the minimum necessary for parity in the spirit of the Washington conference. Let her build 30. It does not matter, except in the sight of traditional pedantry obsessed by mechanical calculations and blind to the moral factors. The great thing is to end the friction, and the way to do it is to let America have her head. If there is friendship as a consequence, and there will be, the American cruisers will be a gain to the whole English-speaking world if ever they are needed. If the friction continued and were further aggravated, the results would be none the less disastrous whether America at the outbreak of the most criminal quarrel in the world's annals had a larger or a lesser number of vessels belonging to the type which has caused the whole confused squabble.

However, the mere technical comparison might stand at the start of that quarrel—if we must discuss the maddest of nightmares as though it were a thinkable contingency. The financial and technical resources of the United States are such that they could construct and sustain bigger fleets than any other two nations to-day could equip and support. We repeat it again: The more utterly free the Americans feel to build as they like, the less they will like to build.

But behind the naval question is the political question. The two countries will have to face together an old problem in a new form—the "freedom of the seas." If you can settle that, you settle everything. If you can not settle that, you will settle nothing. The traditional British practice of interception and search as regards neutral vessels in time of war never can be exercised in the future in the case of the United States. Nothing is more absolutely certain than this. American conviction on this point has never changed for a century and a half. What they felt when they were first an independent nation of 4,000,000 they feel now when they are a nation of 120,000,000, far richer head for head than any other people that has existed, and with a vigor quite equal to their numbers.

At the Washington conference we conceded to them once for all naval equality in principle. That naval equality, whatever else happens, will exist in strength and practice. All the implications of that great new fact in world history must be accepted as a matter of course and as consequences following from our own deliberate signature. When we put our hands to the Washington treaty a revolution in all the former conditions of sea power irrevocably occurred.

Friction on the subject of neutral rights at sea was so acute during the first half of the World War that had the Germans been more judicious America might have come into the conflict on the other side. Had America been anything like as strong at sea as she is now the same catastrophe might easily have happened. President Wilson spoke practically for the whole of the United States when, even as an associate of the Allies, he laid down his alternative. Either the freedom of the seas would be accepted or America would build a navy large enough to assert in all circumstances her own freedom. At that time we made the choice we had to make. We preferred that the United States should build. The reason: We might have been paralyzed in face of military power in Europe possessing the freedom of the land. There would have been no equal security for our own rights.

V. "THE FREEDOM OF THE SEAS"

The rise of the American Navy has changed all that. It offers a double guaranty for the maritime interests which are even more vital to us than they ever can be to the United States. What we could not accept under the practical conditions of 10 years ago we can accept now. Why? Because the imports of food and raw material which are the very blood and life of the nation would be secure in all circumstances, so far as sea power is concerned. Because a submarine campaign like that of 1917 could never be attempted again. Because the maritime intercourse of the whole English-speaking world would be as uninterrupted in war as in peace. Because under the new order, following the revolution in the conditions of sea power to which we gave our consent at the Washington conference, there is no other conceivable guaranty for the most essential part of our security. By comparison with this the question of whether America shall have some superiority in large cruisers to compensate for our required preponderance in smaller cruisers is as dust in the balance.

VI. "THE MEMBERS OF THE LEAGUE"

Unless fundamental agreement on these matters can be reached by that true statesmanship which is common sense raised to a higher power, the League of Nations at Geneva might as well put up its shutters. There is no unity between the chief members of the league. There is no belief that the covenant is a security. In the last few days the French Chamber has been discussing the most elaborate and formidable policy of defense that ever has been undertaken by any country. It is useless to reproach France. Ten of her Departments were trampled by invasion for four years. Towns, villages, and mines were shattered.

The open country was ravaged and laid waste. If anything like this had happened in our own country, they would have been burnt into memory in the same way. Unless we understand French feeling, whether we agree with it or not, there can be no hope for European reconciliation. France perceives that Germany is bound in the end to become stronger than ever, and that nothing on earth can prevent it.

Germany chafes more and more under the continued occupation 10 years after the armistice of a large part of her soil by foreign troops. It is sublime irony that in 1928 territory belonging to one member of the league should still be under the military heel of troops belonging to other members of the league. Once more the relations between France and Italy are inflamed owing to the lenient sentence passed in Paris the other day upon Mondugno, the antifascist assassin of the Italian vice consul, Count Nardini. Signor Mussolini, with his unfailing dramatic touch, has just remarked, "Much has been done, but much remains to be done, considering that in spite of the Kellogg pact, Mr. Kellogg's own country and all others are arming furiously." Nothing could show more vividly why Anglo-American differences must be composed. If the two great English-speaking peoples can set a memorable example of conciliatory settlement there will be every hope for the world's better future. But none otherwise.

Mr. McKELLAR obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield first to the Senator from Maine, and then I will yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, a short time ago I received the following communication from the White House:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 28, 1929.

Hon. FREDERICK HALE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR HALE: By direction of the President I am sending you copy of wire just received from Secretary Hoover.

Sincerely yours,

EVERETT SANDERS,
Secretary to the President.

The inclosure reads as follows:

HOTEL BELLE ISLE, MIAMI BEACH, FLA.,
January 28, 1929.

The PRESIDENT:

My attention has been called to a statement respecting pending cruiser legislation appearing in this morning's press. I have made no public or private statement upon this question, further than appeared during the campaign. I have stated universally to various callers that it would be improper for me to express any views on current matters of the administration. I regret if this reticence should result in misapprehension. As you know, I warmly support your own views, and you may so inform others if you wish to do so.

HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. President, at this point I would like to read to the Senate a telegram which I have received, dated January 26, 1929, from Paul V. McNutt, national commander of the American Legion:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., January 26, 1929.

Hon. FREDERICK HALE,
Chairman Naval Affairs Committee,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The American Legion urges in most emphatic terms the immediate passage of the cruiser bill. The Tenth Annual National Convention of the American Legion at San Antonio enthusiastically and unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the bill known as House bill No. 11526, which authorized the construction of certain naval vessels, among which were 15 light cruisers of 10,000 tons each, be given priority on the list of legislative projects and receive favorable action, and that the President of the United States of America be authorized to begin construction of these vessels at once."

Eight hundred thousand legionnaires demand and expect prompt action on this bill and emphatically urge the retention of the time limit. These ships must be ships of steel and not of paper. They are needed to replace obsolete ships now being used by the Navy and to protect our coast lines, our sea lanes, and our sea-borne commerce. They are the only answer to the failure of the Geneva conference which the rest of the world will understand. With world conditions as they are to-day this Nation must provide an adequate national defense. A more powerful Navy is a necessary part of such a defense and the prompt passage of the cruiser bill is imperative.

PAUL V. MCNUTT,
National Commander the American Legion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The telegram will lie upon the table.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. HARRISON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. I promised to yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I will not be guilty of lese majesty, in view of that last telegram, I want to make a suggestion in regard to the naval bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question of the chairman of the committee before he proceeds?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not catch the first communication the chairman of the committee read. Did he receive that to-day?

Mr. HALE. I received it an hour ago. I have been waiting to present it to the Senate until the Senator from Montana finishes his remarks.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to finish a matter in the nature of business.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maine a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have yielded to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I want to say just a word and then we can take up these other matters. The Senator from Montana has offered an amendment to my amendment. I understand that under the rules it is my privilege, in perfecting the amendment, to accept that amendment. I do accept it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the Senator from Maine advise me and the Senate whether the telegram received from Mr. Hoover by the President is to be interpreted as favoring or opposing the time limit?

Mr. HALE. That I leave to the Senator himself, and to the rest of the Senate, to determine.

Mr. BARKLEY. I assume the telegram was occasioned by a publication in the morning papers credited to Congressman BRITTEN, to the effect that Mr. Hoover favored the time limit, and in that respect was opposing the President. The telegram itself is rather indefinite on that subject. Does the Senator know the fact about the matter?

Mr. HALE. I can give the Senator no further information than that contained in the telegram. I thought it was a fair proposition to give the telegram to the country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine has been denouncing propaganda very vigorously, and I would like to ask him whether he is offering the telegram which he has just read, from Mr. Hoover, or rather from the White House, and the other telegram, from Mr. McNutt, as propaganda in favor of this bill, and is trying to use the propaganda, and the threat of Mr. McNutt, upon the Senate to force through the bill?

Mr. HALE. If I were offering propaganda for the bill, I do not think I would pick out that telegram.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator desire to ask a question?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. In answer to the question of the Senator from Utah, there is no doubt whatever that in his official message to Congress the President opposed the time limit, and asked that it be eliminated from the pending bill, but the insurgents from Maine and California will not agree yet to eliminate it. Congressman BRITTEN was reported in an interview in the papers this morning as saying that Hoover favored the time limit, and that very probably brought this telegram stating that he stood with the President. Then, in order to offset the effect of that against the time-limit provision in this bill, the Senator from Maine offered the telegram from McNutt, the commander of the Legion. As a member of the Legion, I want to challenge the statement in that telegram. I want to say that there are not 800,000 legionnaires in this country supporting this bloodthirsty position of backing up the war profiteers who want these ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, propaganda being offered on both sides, the matter would be left about where it was before, so we will proceed.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Maine, in reference to this telegram from Mr. McNutt, that if these ships may be built at Charleston, S. C., we will see that they are steel.

Mr. HALE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have been greatly interested, as I know every Senator has been who heard it, in the very splendid argument of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. He always makes a strong and vigorous argument on any side of the case he thinks is the right side. I think his reasoning was against his conclusions; but, for all that, he stated his case so fairly, so splendidly, that it seems to me that it is a great contribution to this debate.

Mr. President, as I believe everyone in the Senate knows, I am and have always been an ardent advocate of peace. I have voted for every treaty looking toward peace—good, bad, or indifferent—since I have been in the Congress. I was for the Bryan treaties. I have been for all arbitration treaties. I was for the League of Nations without reservations. I was for the World Court, and I even voted for the Kellogg pact, as insignificant a contribution as that was toward the cause of peace.

I believe that war among nations is as indefensible as dueling used to be, or would be now, among individuals. I would be glad to take any step at all to outlaw it. It ought to be outlawed. It is criminal for nations to sacrifice lives and treasure by going to war.

The American people are opposed to war. They do not covet any other nation's property. They do not covet any other nation's territory. They simply want to be permitted peaceably to work out their own destiny in their own way without injury from other nations. They desire to aid other nations, and all they ask for is peaceably to trade with the rest of the world on terms of equality. I join in these sentiments.

But, Mr. President, I believe, and I believe every other sensible, thinking man knows, that under present conditions, without an agreement, without sanctions or penalties, to keep the peace, without an agreement that can be enforced, it will not do for this Nation alone to disarm. As long as other nations continue to build navies it will be necessary for us to continue to build war vessels.

Mr. President, everyone recalls that during the late World War America did everything within her power to reconcile the parties to that strife and to bring about peace. Our then splendid President offered his good offices to bring about a settlement, but the European powers would not listen to him. Finally we were drawn into the fight. We were compelled to go in. We were forced to go in, and after we went in and settled the issues by force, everyone will recall that we asked for and received no reparation; we asked for and received no territory, and all that we asked for was an abiding agreement to keep the peace.

While every other allied nation at the peace table was crying for more territory and more reparations, the United States alone, under the splendid leadership of President Wilson, asked for nothing except a bond to keep the peace.

More than that, Mr. President, several years after the war was over, America called together a disarmament conference, with the best of intentions, with the noblest of purposes, to reduce the naval armaments of the world so that war might be less likely. The result of that conference I will speak of later. Suffice it to say here that just before the war we entered upon a naval program that would have given us the largest Navy in the world. That program was rapidly being completed when the naval conference came on and we went into a conference and agreed to sink the best part of our Navy. In other words, America disarmed apparently to show the rest of the world that we truly meant what we said when we said that we favored peace. Under that agreement, while America disarmed, no other nation did.

Indeed, as soon as the agreement was signed, other nations began to build additional war vessels, and since that time Great Britain has built 15 great cruisers, adding to her already enormous number of 38; Japan has built 15; Italy, 6; and France, 8; while we have authorized only 8. In other words, the practical result of the disarmament conference, so called, was that America disarmed and all the other nations continued to arm. When President Coolidge in 1927 saw that other nations were madly building great war vessels, he called another conference at Geneva. France and Italy flatly refused to take part in the conference; Great Britain and Japan did, but neither would submit to a limitation-of-cruisers argument. Again, Secretary of State Kellogg used the bilateral pact written by Mr. Briand to get the nations of the world just to say that they were going to keep the peace, and they agreed to this, but, while Secretary Kellogg was over in Paris signing this pact, Great Britain and France were combining on a great cruiser-building program, showing they did not construe the Kellogg pact as in any wise interfering with their war plans.

So that, Mr. President, if we exclude our failure to sign the League of Nations treaty and our refusal to sign the Court of International Justice treaty, the United States has taken every opportunity better to secure the peace of the world, while the other great nations of the world are proceeding calmly to build up their navies. We can not blind ourselves to these facts. We must look them squarely in the face and then take such steps as will protect our Nation and protect our foreign trade.

Mr. President, I am an ardent admirer of the British nation, of British history, of British institutions, of British achievements, of British character, of British literature, of British statesmen, of British tenacity of purpose, of British laws, and of British respect for law, of British ability in trade and commerce. When I was a boy I could name every British king and queen in order and the dates of their reigns, and with a little reflection I might still be able to do it, though it is easy to forget. I believe that the very best in our institutions comes from those of our mother country.

The British people are blood of our blood, bone of our bone, sinew of our sinew, and mind of our mind, and I have nothing in the world but the kindest feeling toward them. I think her diplomats are the greatest in the world—far greater than ours, as has been frequently demonstrated. I have always hoped that the two nations would never have a disagreement or difference; and if such a difficulty should arise, I devoutly hope and believe that we should be able to settle it peaceably, without force. It would be unbelievable for these two great English-speaking nations to resort to force against each other.

But, Mr. President, such a feeling on our part for our British kinsmen should not blind us so that we should not protect our Nation's interests and our Nation's commerce. We all realize that our British neighbors are our great commercial rivals, and we must see to it that our own people are given every protection so that our merchants and manufacturers and farmers shall have equal opportunity with British merchants and manufacturers and farmers, and that our own traders shall have equal opportunities with British traders, and that our commerce shall always be safe from interference on the seas in times of peace and war.

Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho, in his able address last Thursday, stated, and very properly stated, that the purpose of the navy is to protect and defend a nation's commerce and to see that it goes unmolested through the sea lanes of the world. In this he is absolutely correct. This is the crux of the entire situation.

Our foreign commerce constitutes a tremendous portion of the lifeblood of our Nation. We can not afford to have it interfered with in peace or in war, so long as we are neutral. We are entitled to the freedom of the seas. We are failing in our obvious duty to the American people if we should not be able to protect this foreign commerce wherever it goes. The argument is frequently heard that Great Britain should have a greater navy than the United States because she has more commerce to protect. I find that this is not true. I find that the difference between the foreign commerce of the two nations is exceedingly small. Take the two records for 1928, and it is found that the entire value of Great Britain's commerce, imports and exports, was $9,972,600,000, while the combined value of the United States commerce, imports and exports, was $9,050,100,000. The value of Germany's foreign commerce is little more than one-half of that sum, and France's is less than one-half of that sum, and Japan's commerce amounts to only $1,977,700,000, and Italy's is less than Japan's. Looking at our Navy, therefore, as purely a defense of our foreign commerce, we must have a navy which in comparison with other navies is able to protect our commerce wherever it goes. Our commerce is rapidly forging ahead. It is increasing by leaps and bounds, and in a few short years it will far surpass the commerce of every other nation in the world. But it will be claimed that no other nation will dare interfere with it. Why, this is not true. Why, who does not remember that in the year 1914, when the Great War broke out, what happened to our commerce? It was virtually removed from the seas. Cotton—that great export upon which the prosperity of our Nation so much depends—was prohibited from crossing the seas, and the result was that the price went down to almost nothing, bringing ruin and desolation to the cotton growers and to all others who were interested in cotton production. Thus we see how the protection of our trade and commerce vitally affects the welfare and happiness and prosperity of this great Nation.

I want to say that as long as I am a Senator in the Congress I shall never vote in any other way than to uphold and defend that trade and commerce in the sea lanes wherever they may lead. We ought to have a navy adequate to do it. I admit that the Senator from Montana is right in stating that it would be infinitely better to get the other nations to reduce their navies, scaling them down instead of building upward, so that we could get along with less cost and expense. But the value of American commerce being so great, and that commerce being so vital to the welfare and success and happiness of our Nation, there is nothing else for us to do if other nations will not disarm but to arm ourselves so as adequately to protect our commerce. I think it would be criminal for this Nation of ours to disarm our Navy while others are building up theirs.

Mr. President, at this point I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a statement showing the Department of Commerce figures as to the value of our commerce and the commerce of certain other nations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

Value of imports and exports of specified countries for the year 1927 [1]

[Amounts in thousands of dollars, 000's omitted]

Countries	Value of—
	Imports	Exports
United States	4,184,700	4,865,400
United Kingdom	5,927,400	4,045,200
Germany	3,360,400	2,428,000
France	2,071,800	2,164,800
Japan	1,033,100	944,600

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator concede that after we entered the war we joined with Great Britain and acquiesced in her rules with reference to treating commerce all over the world?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is anticipating me. He will find an answer in just a moment. I intend to discuss that very question.

Mr. President, I was greatly interested in the speech made Thursday by Senator BORAH. I heard some of it and read all of it with care. I heartily approve of his proposed amendments. I want to say the same thing with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who offered an amendment to one of the amendments of the Senator from Idaho, and which was accepted by the Senator from Idaho. I approve of that amendment also. They should be added to this bill by all means. They show America's desire for peace. They show that even though we feel forced and are forced by other nations to build these cruisers, we would rather not do so. They show our earnest desire to bring about a limitation of armaments, and thus prevent the likelihood of war. The Senator from Idaho has done a great public service in submitting these amendments. They ought to be unanimously adopted. But we should not delay our cruiser-building program because of this effort to secure the freedom of the seas. In that position the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Montana are, in my opinion, both wrong. The freedom of the seas has been the dream of America, so far as Americans are concerned, during all the ages of our history; but it has been a dream pure and simple. During all of that time Great Britain has been the undoubted, undisputed, uncontrolled, and uncontrollable mistress of the seas.

I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] to the statement I am about to make. After we got in the war she not only reserved but practiced the right, as we all remember, to see what went across the seas from America, and she regulated absolutely what went across in our own ships and in her own or other ships. Indeed, she regulated in every instance just exactly what went across the seas regardless of any position we took. Never so long as I am here am I going to subscribe to the doctrine that any other nation, I care not what nation it is, has the right to say what shall be transported across the seas in American ships.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Democratic administration at that time did join with Great Britain in that right and the Senator, I presume, supported it in doing so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator from Tennessee never supported in his life and never will support any such doctrine as that.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator think if we had had these 15 cruisers at that time, under the circumstances he has described, the price of cotton would have been any higher?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; but if we had had a navy sufficient to protect American commerce, the price of cotton and the prices of other American products would not have been destroyed as it was.

Mr. BROOKHART. But we did not have any merchant ships to carry our stock, so I do not see that a thousand cruisers would have helped any.

Mr. McKELLAR. If we have a navy sufficient to protect our commerce, we can protect it wherever it goes, and that is the only way we can protect it.

Mr. BROOKHART. I presume the Senator would concede the right of Great Britain to use her merchant ships as she pleased.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not when she makes them warships as she did and does. But I will ask the Senator to desist for just a moment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee is correct in his position and I am in sympathy with him, and I think the Senator will agree with me that if we had had a Navy large enough and had challenged those powers they would have withdrawn their orders for the regulation of our commerce.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is undoubtedly true, and I will prove it in just a moment if Senators will be patient. Even when we were her ally during the war she reserved and practiced the right, as we all remember, to see what went across in our own ships, and, indeed, to regulate what went over. We recall also that one of President Wilson's 14 points was the freedom of the seas. He thus stated it and it was his second point:

> Absolute freedom of navigation upon seas outside territorial waters alike in peace and in war except as the seas may be crossed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.

Franklin and Jefferson, Madison and many of our statesmen in our early history had announced the same doctrine. Other great American thinkers had stated it and restated it. President Wilson had to give it up, because Great Britain, flushed with victory, the fleet of her greatest sea rival—Germany—sunk, she knew that she would not have to give it up. I have always believed that President Wilson, knowing that we were unable at that time to enforce the freedom of the seas because our Navy that we were then building was not completed, gave it up, but in his mind was the knowledge that we were fast building a navy equal to that of Great Britain, and that later on we could come to an agreement for the freedom of the seas because Great Britain would know that then, if it were necessary, we could enforce freedom of the seas with our Navy.

In my judgment that demand, if it shall be disputed, can only be enforced by having a sufficient Navy to secure its enforcement. So this great ideal of President Wilson's failed of fulfillment.

Mr. President, I next come to the Limitation of Armament Conference. If freedom of the seas can be reached by diplomatic means, then by all means let us try to reach it in that way. But the greatest blow that ever came to our just claim for freedom of the seas was delivered by the Limitation of Armament Conference of Washington of 1922. The greatest naval victory that Great Britain ever won—and she has won many of them on the sea—was won by her in the great naval battle on land in Washington in 1922. By that agreement the Harding administration, without firing a gun, without making a protest, without securing a benefit, indeed, singing pæans of praise to those who brought it about, agreed to sink and did sink the best part of our Navy.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] in interrupting the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on Thursday called the disarmament conference "the only successful disarmament conference the world has ever known, the one in Washington in 1920." He meant the one in 1922.

Mr. President, if that was a successful disarmament conference so far as the United States was concerned, then God save us from ever having to suffer another such successful disarmament conference. The only nation——

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYDINGS in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in just a moment. The only nation to disarm as a result of that conference was the United States. I am reliably informed that after the conference neither Great Britain nor any other foreign nation ever sank a ship, but we sank 9 battleships—3 of them of 32,000 tons each, 6 of them of 43,200 tons each, and 4 battle cruisers of 43,500 tons each. Some of those vessels were nearly completed, two of them finished, and others just begun; but when completed—and they would have been completed long before this time—we would have had a Navy equal to that of any other nation. We had already expended on those ships some $200,000,000. All we got out of the disarmament conference was the privilege of sinking them and putting our Navy in a place of great inferiority, certainly to Great Britain's Navy and possibly to Japan's.

To my mind, Mr. President, the disarmament conference of Washington of 1922 was not only a willful waste of the people's money, ill-conceived and wholly unjustifiable, but a surrender of American rights. In my judgment, it was a frightful blunder. Who does not remember the propaganda under which the conference was held? Every newspaper and every magazine in the land was praising the conference and claiming that it would bring about an equality of our Navy with that of Great Britain. Every propagandist in the land was singing the praises of the 5–5–3 ratio. There never was a proposal of a 5–5–3 ratio. It was a delusion and a snare.

What was the result of that conference? Perhaps some have forgotten. When the Washington treaty was finally signed it provided that Great Britain should have 22 first-class battleships; the United States should have 18 first-class battleships; and Japan and the other nations a less number. It provided that America should have 500,650 tons and England 558,950 tons. Where is the 5–5–3 ratio in those figures? It is not there. The proposal to that effect, I repeat, was a delusion and a snare. America was to have 500,650 tons as against 580,450 tons for Great Britain!

But, Mr. President, that was only a portion of the disparity. When our experts looked up the question they found that 13 of our 18 battleships could not throw projectiles as far by several miles as could substantially all of Great Britain's battleships. I wonder why those experts did not know that fact before the agreement was entered into? But, at all events, it was overlooked.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McKELLAR. I promised to yield first to the Senator from Iowa, and then I will yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not desire now to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to ask the Senator how it came about that our naval experts did not tell the negotiators that they were getting filched?

Mr. McKELLAR. I never understood that, I will say to the Senator. I have heard no explanation of it. I was not on the "inside" at the time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Are we to understand that the negotiators were fully advised about the matter by the naval experts and that they disregarded the advice?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not say that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Or that the naval advisers to the American delegates were not smart?

Mr. McKELLAR. I started out by saying that I regarded the British as the greatest diplomats and traders in the world, and I think our commissioners were somewhat overreached, to be perfectly frank about it, though I am not criticizing them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Apparently——

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will wait a moment, I will read him the indubitable proof of the fact that our representatives were overreached; and I am not criticizing them.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. I remember a discussion of this same question on the Senate floor at the time, and the Democratic side, led by the late Senator Underwood, fully approved that conference and approved the sinking of the ships to which the Senator from Tennessee has referred.

Mr. McKELLAR. That may be true; I do not remember what our leader did; but I can say that I did not vote for it.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not remember the Senator from Tennessee opposing it in any way.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will find that the RECORD shows I did not vote for it.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator did not?

Mr. McKELLAR. No. I continue, Mr. President. I said the question of gun elevation was overlooked and evidently it was——

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Apropos of the remark that the Senator from Iowa has just made, it should be remembered that the Republican Party has persistently claimed all of the credit for the Washingon Conference on Limitation of Armament.

Mr. McKELLAR. Always; and, by the way, it was referred to by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] as being the greatest disarmament conference that ever took place in the history of the world. In a moment, when I get through answering questions, I want to call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia and the attention of other Senators to just what that conference did.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. My recollection is that the Democratic side refused to follow its then leader, Senator Underwood.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not looked at the vote in a long time; I only know that I did not vote for it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not, and I do not think a majority of the Democratic side did.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure the Senator from North Carolina did not. On this, as on other questions, Senators reserved the right to vote as they individually thought was right and proper.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. Let me prove my assertion of a moment ago to the effect that the Washington Disarmament Conference has been claimed by our Republican friends as one of their party's exclusive assets.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be very happy to have the Senator do so.

Mr. NEELY. I am about to read from that great masterpiece of incredible modern fiction entitled "Republican Campaign Textbook for 1924."

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator will remember I was not very much in line with the Republican platform at that time.

Mr. McKELLAR. My recollection is that at that time the Senator from Iowa was gallivanting around with us somewhat. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEELY. But during the last campaign the Senator from Iowa thoroughly rehabilitated himself as a courageous champion of every article of faith in the entire Republican creed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want to attack in any way the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. NEELY. Neither do I. And I beg the Senator from Tennessee not to construe my charge of Republican regularity as an attack upon the character or statesmanship of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. McKELLAR. He is a fine man and is making a splendid Senator.

Mr. NEELY. In that statement I fully concur.

Mr. BROOKHART. In this instance I have to defend both the Republican President and the President elect against the standpatters who are now insurging against their own leader and their leader elect.

Mr. McKELLAR. I commend the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. NEELY. May I now read from page 360 of the 1924 Republican campaign textbook, under the captivating title "National Defense"?—

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Among the treaties formulated at the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armaments held in November, 1921, was the 5-power naval treaty, entered into by the United States of America, the British Empire, Japan, France, and Italy. This treaty, which binds the five signatory powers to a limitation of their naval armament and the observance of a naval holiday, has been described as "the greatest peace document ever drawn."

That is the penetrating political rhapsody, the substance of which the Senator from New Jersey has recently twice repeated upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. NEELY. He stated that the Washington conference is the only successful disarmament conference in history. I am informed that as a result of this conference the United States has lost her superiority as a naval power and the taxpayers have lost more than $175,000,000 worth of ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. At a cost of about $200,000,000. In my remarks I have reached that very point, and I want to show to the Senate just what that naval agreement did provide. Keep in mind, Senators, that the propagandists said that it was to put our Navy on an equality with that of Great Britain—that it provided for a 5–5–3 ratio. Now, I wish to show the Senate what the real result was.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I just heard the Senator from New Jersey being discussed——

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; the Senator from New Jersey was quoted by both the Senator from West Virginia and myself as having stated the other afternoon that the naval disarmament conference of Washington in 1922, by which Great Britain won the greatest naval victory in her history, was the greatest peace treaty ever signed.

Mr. EDGE. I think my actual language, as I recall it, without referring to the RECORD, was that the Washington Disarmament Conference was the only successful effort at disarmament the world had ever known, or words to that effect.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was about it, and that was strong enough.

Mr. EDGE. I still contend that it was the only successful disarmament conference ever held; in fact, so far as I can recall, it is the only disarmament conference that ever has been held, and, even though the United States did show wonderful generosity—there is no question about that at all; I agree entirely with both Senators as to that—nevertheless the United States led the way for possible disarmament among the nations of the world. I repeat that this was the only successful disarmament conference ever held, even though the United States was the loser so far as dollars and cents were concerned.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I disagree with the Senator about that conference being a successful one. All it did could have been done by the United States or any other nation at any time without a conference. The United States does not need a conference to sink its own war vessels, and that is all in the world that it got from the Washington conference. No other nation sank a war vessel. Great Britain sank some a year or so before the conference took place, but no other nation sank a war vessel as a result of the conference. How can a conference be a successful one that merely provides that one nation shall sink its war vessels?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very much interested in the statement made by the Senator to the effect that Great Britain scrapped nothing.

Mr. McKELLAR. She scrapped about a year before this conference some obsolete vessels, as she had a perfect right to do, but they were scrapped of her own motion and not because of the conference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Information given by the Senator, however, is that after the Washington treaty Great Britain scrapped nothing. I have before me the record of the proceedings, from which I read as follows:

It is further proposed that Great Britain—

(1) Shall stop further construction of the four new Hoods, the new capital ships not laid down but upon which money has been spent.

Mr. McKELLAR. They were on paper, not laid down. She did not sink any new ships built or building.

Mr. WALSH of Montana (reading):

These four ships, if completed, would have tonnage displacement of 172,000 tons.

(2) Shall, in addition, scrap her predreadnaughts, second-line battleships, and first-line battleships up to, but not including, the King George V class.

These, with certain predreadnaughts which it is understood have already been scrapped, would amount to 19 capital ships and a tonnage reduction of 411,375 tons.

The total tonnage of ships thus to be scrapped by Great Britain (including the tonnage of the four Hoods, if completed) would be 583,375 tons.

Now, let me inquire of the Senator, upon what authority does he make the statement that neither Japan nor Great Britain scrapped anything? I am startled at that statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have made the statement frequently before, and I have heard it made by other Senators on the floor of the Senate. The chairman of the committee [Mr. HALE] made it the other day in his opening statement. The Senator will find it there. I take it that he must have been properly informed. I quote Senator HALE:

In addition to this, we agreed to scrap a number of older battleships, as did two of the other four nations party to the treaty—Great Britain and Japan—which battleships could have been kept up only at great expense, and most of them in all probability would have been scrapped had there been no conference on limitation of naval armament.

Great Britain scrapped some old ships, and scrapped some ships that were built on paper; but she did not scrap any actual ship by virtue of this agreement. I further quote from Mr. HALE:

The other parties to the conference agreed to scrap no ships that were in process of construction, with the exception of Japan, and nearly all of her building program was on paper.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have the treaty here. Can it be that they violated the treaty?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know. I can not advise the Senator about that. All that Great Britain did was to scrap $2,600,000 in alleged new construction, which I am reliably informed consisted only of plans and blue prints. She sank some obsolete battleships, but it seems there is some dispute whether she sank them before or after the conference. In either case it is immaterial, as they were obsolete, were of no value, and had to be sunk anyway.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. As measured by the standard of success adopted by the Republican campaign textbook and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], how many more disarmament conferences like the last, would it be necessary for us to hold in order to dispose of all of our naval defense?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not believe we could stand more than two more before our entire Navy would be obliterated.

Now let us see what was done.

Mind you, we had 18 ships and Great Britain was to have 22. Is 22 for Great Britain, 18 for us, and a lesser number for Japan a 5–5–3 arrangement? If so, I have learned ordinary mathematics in vain.

The very agreement is an absolute contradiction and denial of the 5–5–3 ratio. But, at all events, after we had entered into the agreement it was found by our naval experts that 13 of our ships could not shoot as far as the British ships; and thereupon the Congress was appealed to, as we all remember, to pass a resolution authorizing the guns on these ships to be elevated so that they could shoot as far as the British guns; and what was the result? Great Britain took up the matter with the President, and cited this clause in the agreement:

No retained capital ships or aircraft carriers shall be reconstructed except for the purpose of providing means of defense against air and submarine attack * * *. No alterations in side armor, in caliber, number of general type of mounting of main armament shall be permitted, except—

The exception being something that does not refer to this. So when it was proposed to elevate our guns so that they could shoot as far as British guns, a protest came from Great Britain that it was not within the limitation-of-armaments agreement. A pretty 5–5–3 agreement that!

TERMS UNFAVORABLE TO THE UNITED STATES

Remember, Mr. President, that this agreement was heralded as a 5–5–3 agreement. I never saw a greater propaganda on any subject. It was heralded as an agreement that would make the Navies of Great Britain and America equal. I want to point out some of the features of this agreement.

First. America was the only nation to sink any ships.

Second. Great Britain was given a ratio of 22 to 18, instead of 5 and 5.

Third. Great Britain was given a greater tonnage.

Fourth. America sank six ships of a tonnage of 43,200 tons each, leaving her with no ships of that class; and yet Great Britain was permitted to hold the Hood, with 41,200 tons, and to build two capital ships of 35,000 tons each; and the largest ship that we had was a ship of 32,500 tons, as I remember.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator, if I understood him correctly, made the statement that we sank six ships, and that we were not permitted to have any of that class of ships left.

Mr. McKELLAR. No, Mr. President; we sank 15 ships—9 battleships and 6 battle cruisers.

Mr. WHEELER. What class of ships were they?

Mr. McKELLAR. Six of the 9 battleships were 43,200 tons. Our largest ship now is a 32,500-ton ship; and yet this so-called 5–5–3 agreement allowed Great Britain to have one, the Hood, of 41,200 tons, and two others that she was allowed to build of 35,000 tons each.

Mr. WHEELER. How many ships had Great Britain built between the time the armistice was signed and the time of the treaty?

Mr. McKELLAR. She had not built any, as I recall.

Mr. WHEELER. How many had the United States Government built in that time?

Mr. McKELLAR. I had those figures here just a moment ago. I shall have to state them from recollection. She was building 9 battleships, 2 of them absolutely complete, and 6 battle cruisers.

Mr. WHEELER. She had already built some during that period of time. Some had already been finished, had they not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Two were finished; but they were sunk, and they were the most powerful battleships ever built. Our great vessels that were finished or substantially finished went to the bottom of the sea under "the only successful disarmament conference the world has ever known," according to Mr. EDGE.

Mr. WHEELER. What assurance has the Senator that if we build these 15 cruisers a Republican administration will not sink the 15 cruisers after we get them built?

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, we will just have to take that risk. I do not believe the Republican Party will ever undertake to have a recurrence of the horrible fiasco known as the disarmament agreement of 1922. It was such a shocking sacrifice of American ships and American treasure and American security that no party will desire to repeat it.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. How much in money was it that we sank?

Mr. McKELLAR. It was just about $200,000,000. It is fair to the Navy Department to say that they estimate the sum at $175,000,000.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. NEELY. I have the exact figures which were, at my request, recently supplied me by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is estimated sometimes at $175,000,000, and the Senator from Montana this afternoon estimated it at $300,000,000. No absolutely accurate figures can be given; but it is about $200,000,000.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I remember that the late Senator Underwood said we saved more money than we sank by sinking those ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. Senator Underwood was a perfectly splendid man and a great statesman, and I have every respect and honor and esteem for him; he was my friend and I was his; but I did not agree with him on the sinking of these ships. It will be remembered that he was one of the commissioners appointed by President Harding.

I now yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I quote from a letter which I received from the Secretary of the Navy a few days ago:

> The cost in dollars and cents of the new ships scrapped, including cost of cancellation of contracts, and deducting the amount realized for the sale of new ships, was $175,439,275.68.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is less what they got from the sales; the real amount was about $200,000,000.

Mr. NEELY. And may I also read the Secretary's statement as to the ships that were scrapped by the United States and Great Britain as the result of the Washington conference?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad if the Senator will do so.

Mr. NEELY. I again quote from the letter of the Secretary of the Navy:

> The number and tonnage of ships which were scrapped by the treaty—the Washington conference—were as follows:
> United States: Capital ships built, 19.
> Tonnage, 289,850.
> Including North Dakota and Delaware, scrapped on completion in 1923 of West Virginia and Colorado.
> Capital ships building or appropriated for, 13.
> Tonnage, 552,800.
> Includes battle cruisers Lexington and Saratoga, afterwards completed as aircraft carriers.
> Capital ships built and destroyed by Great Britain: Number, 22.
> Tonnage, 447,450.
> British Empire scrapped 4 additional ships, 91,500 tons, on completion of Nelson and Rodney in 1927.
> Capital ships building or appropriated for, 4.
> Tonnage, 172,000.
> These ships were not laid down but contract had been let for their construction.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, of course. My impression is that much of this tonnage was sunk or scrapped before the conference; but, in any event, it was all obsolete and useless.

Now, Mr. President, I want to finish in just one moment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just let me finish the explanation of what the United States got in this celebrated agreement and what Great Britain got in the agreement.

It will be remembered that Great Britain was permitted to hold the Hood, with 41,200 tons, and to build two new capital ships of 35,000 tons each. I stop there long enough to say that while Great Britain was given the right to build two additional ships of 35,000 tons, larger than any ships that America had, the two of 43,000 tons that had just been completed by America, the names of which were read here a moment ago, were sunk. Now, Mr. President, it turns out that the Hood, of 41,200 tons, and the two additional ships that Great Britain has built of 35,000 tons each, are larger than any ship in the American fleet. And yet some of us still talk about a 5–5–3 agreement and our Navy being on an equality with Great Britain.

Fifth. America was prohibited from building any cruisers of more than 10,000 tons; but in this agreement, desirable as it might be for America to build a cruiser of more than 10,000 tons, she is not given the right to do so until 1936. This was to the disadvantage of America, because by reason of her coaling stations Great Britain does not need cruisers larger than that size; while America, because of her dearth of coaling stations, does need cruisers of that size, or larger.

Sixth. Merchant vessels were excluded from the terms of the agreement; and, of course, everybody knows that large numbers of Great Britain's merchant vessels are built so as to be converted into war vessels at a moment's notice in time of war.

Seventh. Great Britain having all of the coaling stations necessary and all the fortified stations necessary throughout the world, the United States and Japan agreed not to build or maintain any naval bases other than those that they now have.

Eighth. Part 2 provides for the utter destruction of the United States vessels. The other parties to the agreement took no chances.

The United States got nothing and Great Britain got continued mastery of the seas until 1936. That was the result of that agreement, the 5–5–3 agreement—a peace agreement! Why, it is absurdly ridiculous!

Ninth. This agreement is to remain in force until December 31, 1936, so that the United States by that conference sank her own superiority until 1936. In other words, by this agreement we guaranteed Great Britain's superiority in battleships and aircraft carriers until 1936; and even after that time, unless we give two years' notice in advance, the treaty goes on indefinitely. We must give the notice; and, of course, what will happen when that comes about, if we do give the notice, is that we will be charged with not being in favor of peace because we desire to protect our rights on the seas by annulling this totally one-sided agreement..

For all these agreements, what did the United States receive? Not a single benefit. I ask anybody here to name a benefit which the United States received. No one replies. I want to say to the Senator from New Jersey, who seems to think that that treaty constituted a great step in the cause of disarmament and peace, that it reminds me of the agreement that sometimes the colored man down South formerly was often facetiously complaining about in his dealings with the white man:

> Nought's a nought and figger's a figger,
> All for the white man and none for the nigger.

In this agreement the United States stands in the shoes of the colored man.

Mr. President, in calling attention to the grave injustice done the United States in that conference I want to say that I do not wish to criticize our commission. I have no doubt that those gentlemen were imbued with the highest and most idealistic principles and purposes.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, if I catch the idea of the Senator from Tennessee, our people are just a little too generous and confiding.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a little too generous and confiding. They no doubt thought that if the United States would deal gently and liberally with the situation that confronted her, if the United States, with practically unlimited resources to build a navy greater than that of any other country, was willing to sink her own ships and place herself in a position of inferiority, that no doubt other nations would do likewise and thus bring about a reasonable disarmament. In this our commissioners made a mistake, for instead of the good example of the United States bringing about a like spirit in other nations, it has brought about an exactly opposite spirit. Indeed, as soon as this agreement was made, and knowing that it extended until 1936, and knowing that the United States would carry out that agreement to the letter until 1936, every other nation began to build naval armaments as never before, and to-day we find ourselves in a position of vast naval inferiority to that of our principal commercial rival and possibly to that of Japan.

Mr. President, I want to say that instead of the disarmament conference of 1922 being a benefit to our country or to the peace of the world, it simply resulted in the sinking of $200,000,000 worth of American war vessels, and in continuing Great Britain's mastery of the seas. That treaty will expire by limitation in 1936, and it ought not be renewed.

I believe in disarmament, but not in disarmament by which one nation disarms and the other nations are permitted to keep their arms, by which one nation sinks her ships, and the other nations keep their ships of war.

The disarmament treaty destroyed the American Navy. It guaranteed Great Britain's mastery of the seas until after 1936. It has prevented any suggestion of an agreement for the freedom of the seas. But for that agreement by this time America would have had a navy equal to that of Great Britain without much additional cost, and it would have been easy enough to have obtained from Great Britain an agreement for the freedom of the seas whereby the ships of any nation would be unmolested in times of peace and unmolested in times of war as long as they did not carry contraband or seek to go into a port blockaded in fact.

Mr. President, we should build these cruisers. We should proceed to construct such a navy as will defend our commerce, not for the purpose of going to war, but for protecting our commerce against the world. It is too valuable, as the above figures show, to be destroyed in a moment. If it was seriously interfered with for a time, it would cause the greatest distress in our own land. We ought not to jeopardize it; we ought not to fail to take any step that will insure its protection.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am interested in what the Senator has said about the peace conference. Without trying to get into any controversy with the Senator over its results, whether good or bad, I would like to ask him whether the charge has been made that any nation has violated the terms of that agreement.

Mr. McKELLAR. No. I think the only protest was from the British Government, that we might be violating the agreement when we sought to elevate the guns on the 13 ships, so that they could shoot as far as those of the British ships.

Mr. NORRIS. If all the nations engaged in the peace conference have kept the faith, while it might have been a bad conference and all that, if we agree that they have all kept the faith, there could be no charge made, then, against any nation, of bad faith.

Mr. McKELLAR. No charge of bad faith is being made now by me. I am not making any charge of bad faith. I am simply pointing that the United States received absolutely no benefit from the pact.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana, according to the RECORD of a few days ago, I think made the statement that Great Britain had, in effect.

Mr. NORRIS. The statement of the Senator from Indiana was to the effect that in spirit Great Britain had violated the agreement by building cruisers.

Mr. McKELLAR. The agreement did not apply to cruisers. It applied only to battleships, aircraft carriers, a limitation of 10,000-ton cruisers, and certain other things which need not be enumerated.

Mr. NORRIS. While I am not excusing Great Britain at all for building cruisers—I think she is to blame for most of the agitation for a big navy here—at the same time I think we have to admit that Breat Britain has not violated the peace conference agreement.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not making any charge that Great Britain has violated the agreement. Why should she? She got everything she desired in that conference. She should consider it the ark of the covenant of her mastery of the sea until 1936, or as long as she can hold it in effect.

Mr. NORRIS. There was no limitation as to cruisers. There should have been, I think.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so, too. The Senator is right about that; but there was not.

Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. NEELY addressed the Chair.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield first to the Senator from Alabama because I have not yielded to him, and he has been seeking to interrupt me for some time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator was making such a splendid speech that I did not want to break the continuity of his thought. Does the Senator understand that the battleships which were scrapped were sunk outright, that they were not dismantled, and the machinery, the boilers, the armor plate, and other materials were not taken off and saved to be utilized for some purpose?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know just what was done, and can not advise the Senator. But I want to say that if he will look at Part II of this treaty of 1922 he will find that Great Britain took no chances about it. You never read more perfect plans of ship destruction. All of those things have gone where they can never be used again in warfare.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator and I were in the same class; I did not vote for the measure, either, which required the destruction of the ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. I congratulate the Senator. I now yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I think that we should felicitate ourselves upon the fact that if there should be another disarmament conference, during the next four years, we could rely upon Mr. Hoover's superior knowledge of British genius, statesmanship, and diplomacy acquired during 20 years residence in the British Empire to protect the United States against a repetition of such disasterous consequences as we suffered in 1921, as pointed out by the able Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator does know, however, that Mr. Hoover is in favor of taking out the time limit; does he not?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I can not say that I do. I heard the telegram read, but my hearing is not as good as my eyesight, when it comes to getting my mind on a thing, and I did not understand just what was meant by that telegram.

Mr. NORRIS rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator from Nebraska examined the telegram?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but I was going to suggest to the Senator, when he was comparing his eyesight and his hearing, that the Senator's only knowledge came from hearing the telegram read, but I take it his eyesight is so much better that he looks clear down to Florida, to the rendezvous of the President elect, and he can decide from his eyesight and refute what comes to his hearing.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will look at the telegram in the RECORD in the morning. I am not taking any part on the political side of the question. I am looking at this thing solely from the viewpoint of an American citizen without regard to partisanship who wants to see his country's business unmolested, who wants to see his country's commerce and trade go wherever it may, and have the protection of America behind it.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the Senator heard my colleague relate this afternoon what Great Britain had done. What would the Senator have done under the circumstances that existed during the last war?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is a last year's bird's nest. There is no use bothering about what happened during the war. That is past; my opinion, if I had one, would be of no practical value; and I have no opinion on that subject.

Mr. WHEELER. The claim is that we want to build these ships so as to stop that sort of thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would never on earth agree that Great Britain or any other nation should regulate American commerce as it was regulated before we entered the war or while we were in the war. It is a source of pain and regret and mortification and humiliation to me to think of what was done during that period.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that what Great Britain did during the war is a source of pain and mortification. I think the Senator is right about that. But if we had had the big navy which the Senator favors, and those things had happened, would the Senator then have had us go to war with Great Britain?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no, Mr. President. I was opposed to our going to war; it was against my every feeling to vote for the resolution declaring us in a state of war, which I did finally vote for. Going to war is a very serious thing and it certainly ought not to be decided upon a hypothetical question.

Mr. NORRIS. If we had had the navy the Senator wants us to have sent along with the merchant ships, to protect the merchant ships from attack, it would have been their duty then to have protected them, and would not that have been the first step in war?

Mr. McKELLAR. My position is that whenever the United States has a navy equal in size or strength to any other navy, no other nation is going to interfere with our trade and commerce, and we all know it.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is proceeding on the theory, then, that because we are big enough and strong enough, we will dominate everybody else.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; we do not want to dominate anybody else; but we do not want other nations to dominate us. As I said in the beginning, I would a thousandfold rather we could have other nations by agreement reduce their navies, "scale them down," as Senator WALSH states it, and put them on terms of equality, but it does not look as if that will be done, and I want to point out the reasons why we have not been able to get them to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. If our Navy is to be used to protect us in the circumstances to which attention has been called, when such a thing happens as happened to our ships during the World War on the part of Great Britain, then it seems to me it follows that if we are going to have any good out of it, we would immediately use it.

Mr. McKELLAR. If we have as large a navy as that of any other nation, there is no nation that is going to attack us or interfere with our trade and commerce, because we will have not only the Navy but we will have the materials of war to back up what our Navy stands for.

Mr. NORRIS. Did not Germany interfere with our commerce in the same way England did, when she had no navy? It was all blockaded. Yet she did that.

Mr. McKELLAR. She had the second largest navy in the world at that time; but the cases are not parallel.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I understand the position of the Senator from Tennessee to be simply this, that we want to protect our commerce upon the high seas, and we want to assert and defend the doctrine of the freedom of the seas so far as we are concerned.

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely. If we can get that by peaceable means, of course we should get it in that way; but in any event we must protect our commerce.

Mr. HEFLIN. When our commerce leaves an American port, we want it to get to its destination, and we do not propose that anybody shall interfere with our trade. That is my position.

Mr. McKELLAR. Other nations can not interfere with it with my consent, or by my vote.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I remind the Senator from Tennessee that in the very infancy of our Government, in 1812, we did not hesitate to go to war with Great Britain because of her interference with our commerce.

Mr. McKELLAR. Indeed we did not. It has been a principle of American statesmanship from the beginning of the Government down, and even before the present Government was created, to maintain that position. Mr. Franklin stood for it in the beginning and so did Jefferson and so did Madison.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator recall any claim that the disarmament conference of 1921 and 1922 was violated by Great Britain or any other country?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. There was no necessity for Great Britain violating it. It operates substantially only against the United States. We are the only nation that would have any right to complain. It is a unilateral agreement, I may say to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It seems to me that the Senator's speech should be directed more toward the denunciation of those public officials in America who agreed to and brought about the disarmament conference, rather than toward Great Britain and the other countries who have not violated any of the terms of the disarmament conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am such a kindly soul that I do not believe in denouncing anybody. I am not denouncing other nations, and I am not denouncing the people of our own Nation or our own commissioners. I am trying to lay before the Senate and before the country the facts just as they are, unadorned, about the present naval situation and to show the true meaning of the disarmament conference. I hope the Senator, nor anyone else, will think I am denouncing anyone—nation or individual.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the Senator thinks the disarmament conference resulted in a great loss and great disadvantage to the United States; and I agree with him.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; an overwhelming and uncalled-for loss.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If it is true that there was an overwhelming loss to the United States, somebody agreed in the disarmament conference to the loss which has resulted so disastrously to the United States, as the Senator has pointed out.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps the Senator was not here when I made the statement about our commissioners. I think our commissioners in the conference were animated by the highest motives and by the highest purposes. They just felt, "Here is the United States that ought to set the example for disarmament. We are willing to make any sort of agreement that these people will make and to show them the way." Therefore they erred on the right side, perhaps, and I am not in a mood to challenge them or to criticize them for it. I know they were men animated by the highest motives and purposes, and I do not want to challenge their motives or purposes. The result of what they did was to set a splendid example to the world; but the other nations, instead of following it, have continued to build as never before. The conference did not help the cause of naval disarmament and cost the United States a splendid navy and vast sums of money.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In other words, in the light of the hour and time in which they acted, they acted undoubtedly for the best interests of the country and the world.

Mr. McKELLAR. As they thought was best. They made a great mistake as it all turned out.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And later events have given us a different picture. Of course the Senator believes in a disarmament conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why of course, provided our representatives are not the only ones to accept the disarmament agreement.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As I understand the Senator—and I am in accord with him if I understand him correctly—the two essential things in the world to-day in order to make a great motion toward world peace are, first, the adoption of the principle of freedom of the seas as suggested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and, second, disarmament.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think we ought to use every endeavor to accomplish both ends. I am strongly in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Idaho as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Montana. It should become a part of international law. But I do not agree with the Senator that the way proposed by the Senators from Idaho and Montana is the best way to go about it. I think we ought to include their amendments in this measure and then let the rest of the world know that we are going to protect our commerce by building the ships.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. As I understand the Senator, if there is another disarmament he wants some other country than ours to be the dupe?

Mr. McKELLAR. I would not say that, but if there is another disarmament conference I want some other nations in addition to the United States to disarm. I want us all to disarm together.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. With pleasure.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator was discussing the disarmament conference. The conference agreed, as the Senator has properly stated, to limit battleships and aircraft. But they left cruisers and ships under 10,000 tons without limit.

Mr. McKELLAR. They put a limit on the cruisers, but not enough of a limit.

Mr. SWANSON. They put on a limit of 8-inch guns and 10,000 tons. I want the Senate to understand that when that was agreed to the cruiser tonnage of Great Britain in comparison to the United States was 5 for the United States and 6.6 for Great Britain. At the time of the Washington conference that was the relative cruiser strength, which did not make much of a real disparity between the two nations. We had a superiority at that time in destroyers which would have made the real disparity less. We built no cruisers from 1908 until 1923—15 years. Great Britain has increased her cruiser strength and gotten rid of all her old class of cruisers so that now the ratio is about 13 for Great Britain as against 5 for us. Great Britain started the competition to try to prevent equality of the two navies. We started no competition. We waited 15 years, and we have stood still during that time, but Great Britain has gone on until now the ratio is 13 to 5. The only question is whether we want to have that ratio continue.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what he includes when he says 13 to 5?

Mr. SWANSON. If we were to take the relative strength of all guns in power to shoot guns of relative merit, together with other items—that is, what would be the basis if they were on the firing line, and if we had to determine as to our ability or inability to win a battle—we would have to include speed, amount of gun power, size of guns, and so forth. On that basis their ratio would be 13 to 5 at present.

Mr. WHEELER. Our cruisers are much larger than those of Great Britain.

Mr. SWANSON. Some are and some are not.

Mr. WHEELER. The vast majority of them are larger.

Mr. SWANSON. Oh, no.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; not by any means.

The Senator from Idaho produces as an argument excerpts from President Coolidge's address about war debts. This argument as applied here is fallacious, Mr. President. It is true that we owe some sixteen or seventeen billions of dollars, but we are rapidly paying this debt off and, if it were necessary to be paid even more rapidly, we could do it. At all events, we are better prepared than any other nation to take the necessary steps to protect our commerce.

Again, the Senator from Idaho argues as to economy. This argument also is fallacious. These 16 ships will cost $274,000,000. Why, Mr. President, we are refunding more than this amount to big corporations each year on taxes that were paid many years ago. We are refunding these sums largely to corporations that during the war were called "war profiteers." If we would use the money that we are paying back to war profiteers, we could build a larger navy than any other nation in the world.

Mr. President, Great Britain is not going to war with us unless she knows that she can defeat us. And she does not know that and can not know that. But what she can do is, little by little, take our commerce away by putting us at a disadvantage in world trade, and she must not be permitted to do this. The United States must trade with the world on terms of perfect equality with every other nation.

Mr. President, that freedom of the seas that was yearned for by Franklin, Jefferson, and Wilson can be obtained in but one way, and that is by building our Navy equal to the navy of Great Britain. We need a navy for the protection of our commerce just as much as she does. The sooner she realizes this the better it will be for all concerned.

But the Senator from Idaho says, as I understand him, that he is in favor of this bill but he wants to postpone the actual building of these vessels until we have a chance to get an agreement from Great Britain for freedom of the seas. I think that is what President Cleveland once called an "iridescent dream," unless we take some means to accomplish it.

Mr. BRUCE. It was Senator Ingalls who said that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think then that President Cleveland quoted it. Senator Ingalls was probably the author. I yield to the superior literary genius of my distinguished friend from Maryland.

Why, Mr. President, Great Britain has but recently had this chance, but turned it down. President Coolidge, in a splendid spirit of peace, going the very limit to obtain a limitation of armaments, called a meeting at Geneva; and Great Britain came to the meeting and then absolutely refused to limit the number of cruisers she was going to build. She disregarded the agreement at Versailles. She disregarded President Wilson's desire for an agreement after the war. She secured an agreement in 1922 virtually sinking the greater part of our Navy. She refused to yield on the cruiser question at Geneva. She refused to permit us to raise the elevation of our guns. She reserved the right to overhaul our vessels. During the war she even passed upon what goods should be shipped upon our ships when we were allies. She entered into an agreement with France while Secretary Kellogg was over there to get his peace treaty signed, providing for a building program of cruisers with France; and when she signed the Kellogg treaty she specifically excepted her every interest on land and sea.

Under these circumstances, Mr. President, I am convinced that it is our duty to build these cruisers. I am convinced that there should be no delay about it. I am convinced that we will never get an agreement for freedom of the seas, protecting the rights of neutrals during the time of war, until we build a navy equal to that of any other country in the world. We do not want a larger one. We do not want to take command of the seas, but we do want to protect our commerce on the seas wherever it mya be.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment deferring the building of these ships. It ought not to be agreed to. It ought to be rejected straight out. We have been too generous in that regard. The sinking of our own ships did not bring about a better spirit. The conference at Geneva shows that as long as Great Britain thinks she can control the naval situation she is going to control the seas. She is not going to cut down the number of her ships. She has to-day 53 cruisers with a total of 397,140 tons. The United States, including all that she is building, has only 18 with 155,000 tons. Japan has 27 with 213,955 tons. They will agree to no limitation until the United States shows that she means business and is going to build a cruiser force adequate to protect her trade and commerce unless the other nations agree to limit themselves in cruiser building. After our experience in the Limitation of Armaments Conference and after our experience in the Geneva conference, after the splendid efforts of President Coolidge in seeking a limitation as to cruisers, and even after the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, we have no chance to bring about the results desired except to proceed to build these ships, and others, if need be. But any time limitation on these ships, or reducing the numbers now to be built, should be voted down, and I believe will be.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have finished what I desired to say, but I am very happy to yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Did the protest from Great Britain prevent us from raising the elevation of the guns on our battleships?

Mr. McKELLAR. It did for a great while, but I think probably she informed us later that she had no objection to our elevating the guns.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Perhaps the Senator from Maine can enlighten us on that point.

Mr. McKELLAR. I transfer the question to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator kindly repeat his question?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Did the protest from Great Britain prevent us from raising the elevation of the guns on our battleships?

Mr. HALE. It did for a time, but later the matter was adjusted, and we are now elevating the guns on our battleships.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I send to the desk a telegram, which I ask to have read, and two letters which I should like to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read the telegram.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., January 8, 1929.

CITIZENS CONFERENCE ON CRUISERS,
Washington Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Please record me as opposed to the 15-cruiser building program.

Rabbi EPHRIAM FRISCH.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I now ask that the letters accompanying the telegram may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters referred to are as follows:

YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION,
Dallas, Tex., December 28, 1928.

Secretary WASHINGTON COUNCIL ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS,
1901 F. Street NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am sorry I can not accept your invitation to dinner on Tuesday, January 8. The distance is prohibitive. However, I am in deep sympathy with the objects of the meeting and all efforts to make war a thing of the past. My good wishes to you, and may every step taken be in the direction of world peace.

Very sincerely yours,

FLORENCE A. LYNES,
Executive Secretary Young Women's Christian Association,
Dallas, Tex.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., January 3, 1929.

CITIZENS CONFERENCE ON CRUISERS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIENDS AND FELLOW WORKERS: I am very thankful indeed for the invitation to attend the conference which is to meet on the 8th. I would be more than glad to be there on that occasion, as I regard it a work of the greatest importance; but as it is impossible for me to attend, I will express my mind on the matter in a letter. My most earnest prayer is that such work may be done at the conference and such influence be exerted by it, followed by other such efforts, that Congress will not pass the cruiser bill.

The time has fully come when the United States should demonstrate the Christian spirit to the world; but if the Senate were to pass the cruiser bill it would demonstrate to the world just the opposite to the Christian spirit and would misrepresent the wishes of the great body of churchgoing people, "the staff and stay," the stability and continuity of our country, and would engender suspicion, fear, and loss of confidence, and finally enmity toward the United States and toward each other among the nations, and renew a spirit of competition in all military preparations. This is the way wars are made.

If the United States, a Christian nation, for an offense, whether real or imaginary, were to call in operation the use of the cruisers to remedy the offense, however military the other nations may be, they could not fail seeing paradox. It really seems to me that just now is a crisis in our country's history.

OUR GOVERNMENT IS BEING WEIGHED IN THE BALANCE—THE SCALES ARE ADJUSTED

ON THIS SIDE IS—	ON THE OTHER SIDE—
Kellogg's general peace pact, by which the other nations have expressed their readiness to follow the lead of the United States in ratifying it.	The cruiser bill for preparedness for war if any nation infringe upon our rights, with all the crime destruction, loss of life and property and misery that follow in its train.
The train of blessings which are bound to follow.
Now, which is the most worthy?	The Senate must decide.

Very sincerely yours,

SETH G. HASTINGS.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I did not like the expression of the Senator from Tennessee that Great Britain "gave her permission." The Senator does not really mean that we ever sought her permission?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I do not think we ever sought it, but I will ask the Senator from Maine. Did we seek to have Great Britain withdraw her protest against elevating our guns on our own ships? Did the executive department do that?

Mr. HALE. I do not know how it was done.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not know whether it was done on our initiative or on the initiative of Great Britain? I wish to say to the Senator that I have no desire to criticize Great Britain. I merely desire to say that I do not know how it was done.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thought the language of the Senator was rather a criticism of our Government, because in that regard it is subject to criticism if it asked permission of Great Britain.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether permission was asked or not; I would like to know.

Mr. HALE. It was to all intents and purposes withdrawn; there is no question about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. At any rate, it has been withdrawn; and I am very happy to know that Great Britain has withdrawn the protest, and that we are now elevating the guns on our ships.

Mr. President, let us pass this bill, including the Borah and Walsh amendments, and no others. Let us protect American trade and commerce on the high seas. We have taken the lead heretofore in seeking naval disarmament. Let us leave such proposals to other nations for a time, unless they show a willingness to agree to the principle of freedom of the seas.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] a while ago read a statement from a book showing that Great Britain actually sank some ships. I think, however, they were all obsolete. I had made the statement that no other nation had sunk any ships. If I am mistaken about it, I want to withdraw that statement from my speech, because I have no desire whatsoever to make even an unintentional misstatement of facts.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator made the statement a moment ago, as I understood him, that we had only 18 cruisers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; that is the number as it happens that we have built or building in addition to those we already had.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is referring to 22 old cruisers which we have in the yards of the country and which we still keep on the active list, but which are not effective compared with modern cruisers.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, we have 18 built or building.

Mr. HALE. We have 18 modern cruisers in addition to the 22 old cruisers.

Mr. WHEELER. What I want to get at is this: The Senator from Maine stated the other day that the 15 cruisers provided for in the pending bill were for replacement. The Senator from Tennessee, as I understand, says that we now have 18 cruisers. I want to ask him whether these 15 cruisers are for replacement, to take the place of 15 of the 18.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is absolutely immaterial to the Senator from Tennessee whether they are for replacement or are to be built as additions to the Navy. I want a sufficient cruiser force to protect American trade and American commerce; and it is immaterial to me whether they are for replacement purposes or are general additions to our Navy.

Mr. WHEELER. I know it is immaterial to the Senator from Tennessee as to whether they are for replacement or not, but, for the benefit of the other Members of the Senate, we ought to get the facts straight, and know whether or not we have 18 cruisers or have 42 cruisers or how many we have.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will look up the figures and enlighten the Senator to-morrow, if I can, and if he desires.

Mr. HALE. The Senator was referring, of course, to modern cruisers.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Do We Need 15 More Cruisers Now?" written by Frederick J. Libby.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DO WE NEED 15 MORE CRUISERS NOW?

By Frederick J. Libby

The discussion that has begun on the 16-ship bill now before the Senate had led to many questions, addressed to us both in public meetings and by mail. It will be of use to all of our readers to know the answers to these questions.

1. What is the present cruiser situation?

Answer. The United States has 10 big, modern cruisers and is building 8 more. Great Britain has 13 and is building 6 more for its own use and 2 for Australia. In addition Great Britain has 33 little old cruisers, started during the war, and 25 of them completed during the war, which will all be obsolete soon. Their average size is 4,100 tons; their total tonnage is 137,000 tons. Add to them nine others, some of which are a little older still, and totaling 48,000 tons, and you have before you the nub of this whole controversy. Great Britain has 42 little old cruisers, totaling 185,000 tons, most of which will be obsolete within five years. Our old cruisers, totaling 179,000 tons, are already obsolete.

Our "big Navy" group tried at Geneva and is trying now to get us to give them as many tons of big new cruisers as the British have in little old ones, thus gaining superiority when the British cruisers wear out, unless the British build in competition with us. They don't say anything about the fact that we built a great fleet of destroyers during the war while Britain was building cruisers, and that we now have 100 more destroyers than England; nor do they refer to the fact that we have 124 submarines built and building, of various sizes but totaling 93,000 tons, to Great Britain's 74 submarines built and building, totaling 67,000 tons.

2. Is not our Navy far behind the British Navy, and does it not need these cruisers in order that it may attain parity?

Answer. No; our Navy, as the President explained in his message to Congress two years ago, is the equal of the British Navy now. We are a little behind the British Navy in cruisers and ahead in submarines and destroyers. So we are substantially equal on the whole.

The President's words were: "Only one navy in the world approaches ours and none surpasses it." Since these words were uttered, Great Britain has laid the keels of three cruisers and we have laid the keels of seven.

3. Do we need cruisers for bargaining purposes?

Answer. It is true that the Washington naval conference succeeded when we had superiority to bargain with, and that the Geneva naval conference failed when we didn't have superiority; but we believe that the Geneva conference, under the direction of admirals, was bound to fail. It is evident that public opinion in Great Britain has undergone a marked change as the result of that failure of the disarmament conference, and that the next conference is practically sure to succeed because the people of both countries want agreement and no competition in navies. Our wealth is big stick enough, and it will be wiser for us to let the British liberals wield that on their own "big navy" group.

4. Aren't the "pacifists" trying to "scrap" the Navy?

Answer. No; the pacifists are asking for general reduction of armaments of all nations, and the Kellogg pact makes a starting point for limiting the increase in military establishments throughout the world. Our antiwar groups are exceedingly reasonable in their consideration for the militarists, for they are not going to protest a naval appropriation bill of $350,000,0000 that the President has recommended, which includes appropriations for eight cruisers being built at the present time.

But when the insatiable shipbuilders ask for 15 more cruisers we are drawing the line there.

5. Is the 16-ship bill a "replacement program?"

Answer. Not in a real sense. Our Navy men for two years have proclaimed that "America has only 10 cruisers to Britain's 40." Suddenly we are told, "We have 40 cruisers and 22 of them need replacing." A pamphlet published by the naval intelligence section of the Navy Department shows that we have 10 modern cruisers built and 8 building; and in addition to these, 22 old cruisers are listed which the Navy propagandists had been omitting, which are now resurrected in order that they may be "replaced." Their ages are given. One of them is the Olympia, Dewey's flagship at Manila, 34 years old. The Constitution and the Bon Homme Richard have not been listed, but they would make 24 to be "replaced."

When Congressman BRITTEN last winter proposed this explanation of why we are asked to build all these cruisers, the late Congressman Butler, who was on the House Naval Affairs Committee practically throughout his term of 32 years, replied:

"I didn't know these cruisers were to be replacements. Nothing has been said about their being replacements, so far as I know." (Baltimore Sun, February 18, 1928.)

The same Congressman Butler on January 4, 1927, commented thus on Congressman FRENCH'S reference to these old relics:

"Tell me where you got that list, please; that list of ships. You have Dewey's Fleet at Manila, have you not? You know very well, my friend, that those ships are not worth any more than my old automobile that I traded for 35 gallons of gasoline."

In other words, the "replacement" cry has been raised to conceal the fact that actually we are increasing our Navy.

6. But will not the cruiser bill pass before the country can be heard from?

Answer. No; it has to overcome serious opposition in the Senate. The effort will be made to rush the bill through, because its sponsors fear the rising tide of protest which they know is surely coming. This protest should be prompt and vigorous. If it is, the cruiser bill will fail of passage or at least be seriously modified.

TRANSFER OF THE RETURNS OFFICE

Mr. NYE. I move to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed the bill (H. R. 9570) to provide for the transfer of the returns office from the Interior Department to the General Accounting Office, and for other purposes, in order that I may propose an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, in explanation of my request let me say at this time that the bill has been before the Senate committee for nearly a year.

The wording of the proposed act is: "This act shall take effect July 1, 1928," whereas the date should be "1929."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota to reconsider the vote where the bill named by him was read the third time and passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NYE. I now move to amend the bill, on page 2, line 14, after the words "July 1" and the comma, by striking out the figures "1928" and inserting the figures "1929."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

U. S. COAST GUARD CUTTER "BEAR"

Mr. JONES. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 14452) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to donate to the city of Oakland, Calif., the U. S. Coast Guard cutter Bear. I invite the attention of the junior Senator from California to the bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I understand the consideration of the bill will not lead to any debate?

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the object of the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. It is to give to the city of Oakland, Calif., one of these cruisers. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection.

Mr. TRAMMELL. May I ask a question? Is the donation or gift recommended by the Navy Department?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The bill is recommended by the department.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to donate, without expense to the United States, to the city of Oakland, Calif, the historic Coast Guard cutter Bear, for museum and exhibition purposes without charge for admission.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, under an order heretofore agreed to, refers to the appropriate committee the message this day transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States.

RECESS

Mr. JONES. In pursuance to the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into, I move that the Senate now take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 29, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

IMPORTATION OF SUGAR FROM THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. GARDNER of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement made before the Committee on Ways and Means by Mr. Vicente Villamin, Filipino lawyer and economist, of New York City.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Mr. VILLAMIN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the swelling deluge of prophetic words adverse to the Philippines and the fact that I am the last speaker at these hearings for that country, may I suggest that my time be extended to 10 minutes, assuring this committee that I will not add unnecessarily to the verbal tonnage of the day?

The CHAIRMAN. The 5-minute rule will have to be adhered to.

Mr. VILLAMIN. Very well, then. I am going to speak on the broader aspects of the proposition of limiting the importations of sugar from the Philippines to the United States in defiance of the free trade existing between the two countries.

Gentlemen, irrespective of my wishes and aspirations as a Filipino citizen, I believe, as a modest student of international affairs, that the United States is going to stay in the Philippines indefinitely. This assertion finds support in the domain of international realities.

At present the Philippines is the most vulnerable sector on the circumference of America's national defense. Obviously, America's course in the premises is to build up and vitalize the Philippines and convert it into an appreciable asset, politically, economically, strategically.

To accomplish this end two things are essential. First, to be assured of the good will and loyalty of the 12,000,000 Filipinos, which can be realized by vouchsafing to them equitable treatment and equal opportunity under the American flag. Second, to strengthen the Philippines and the Filipinos by developing and utilizing their natural resources.

If the tariff limitation principle, as contemplated in the Timberlake resolution, is adopted, it will effectively stop further economic development in the Philippines. This will embrace not only sugar but all other products as well, including those noncompetitive commodities not produced in continental United States, like rubber, coffee, quinine, fibers, and other tropical raw materials.

Here is an example of what I mean. One of these days that genius, Thomas Edison, may succeed in producing synthetic rubber. In that event Philippine rubber would doubtless be, following the principle of limitation, the subject of a "Timberlake" treatment.

Therefore I say if the restriction theory is established you will have planted a dynamite in the foundation stone of America's international position in the Far East, the very area to which world affairs have gravitated with all their tremendous possibilities.

If the United States, by her vacillation aggravated by equivocation, is not going to permit the development of the Philippines by Americans and Filipinos either separately or conjointly other nations will assume that profitable undertaking. Those islands are too rich in natural resources to remain unnoticed, unmolested, and untouched. The nation that desires most and needs most that opportunity is Japan. Geographical propinquity, inadequate resources, and the actualization of her program of industrialization to meet her problem of overpopulation are the considerations that animate Japan's purposes and plans.

Gentlemen, without sounding any alarm or wagging the tongue of the alarmist, it is indubitable that the resources of the Philippines, including the nearly half a billion tons of iron-ore deposits, under the financial, not to say political, control of Japan would serve powerfully to strengthen Japan's economic sinews and consequently enhance her military power. This fact bears grave connotations to the United States as a power with vital interests in the Pacific that is of the very warp and woof of her national and international policies.

You will therefore have, if you adopt the principle of tariff restriction in your trade relations with the Philippines, surrendered from the armory of American authority the instrument for the destruction of that authority.

Mr. Chairman, I do not have the time to refute the arguments of the beet-sugar gentlemen point by point. In a friendly fashion I should have wished to engage with them in a blow-by-blow debate. I can only say one word now: From the right side of this committee I have listened to the enunciations of the fundamental philosophy of tariff protection, epitomized in guarantees of American market, American labor, American wages, and American equipment. That is all well and good. Official records show, however, that the labor in the beet-sugar industry is inconsequentially American and overwhelmingly Mexican.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is with becoming appropriateness that the first speaker at these hearings for the beet-sugar industry, Mr. Cummings, reechoing in a falsetto voice the protectionist philosophy, really sang the pæans of praise to the Mexican peons. "All hail to the Mexicans; to hell with the Filipinos"—that's exactly what they mean in plain American lingo.

Gentlemen, our agricultural problem is depressing. While our soil yields only 2 tons of sugar an acre that of Louisiana yields 3 tons, Porto Rico 5 tons, and Hawaii, according to the Hawaiian representative who spoke yesterday, yields 6.39 tons.

The Philippines, in 1928, contributed 9 per cent of the sugar consumed in the United States that year. These good people would want you to believe that we could displace them from the United States market. Gentlemen, when Cuba reduced her contribution to the total consumption of the United States in 1928 through a self-imposed restriction by 9 per cent, did the Philippines rush into the lurch to make up for the diminution? Statistics say no. It was the continental beet and cane sugar that took care of that, increasing its percentage in the national consumption from 15 to 21.

This instance demonstrates conclusively the overpowering vitality of the beet and cane sugar industry of the United States. Increased tariff protection will intrench them more strongly and fortify their relative position of strength respecting the sugar that comes from the other side of the globe.

Now, as to profits in sugar. I have the latest fortnightly report of the Manila Stock Exchange. The nine sugar stocks quoted therein averaged less than 17 per cent in dividends paid in 1927, and the mills were the most efficient ones in the Philippines. During that year 60 per cent of the beet-sugar industry paid more than 30 per cent dividends. Is this not significant?

Finally, let us see what this war talk in connection with sugar is all about. They say in case of war sugar supplies can not be brought over from the Philippines. Now, logically, would not this be a good thing for the beet-sugar interests? It would mean, on the one hand, the destruction of the Philippine sugar industry if war shuts off the sea lanes, and, on the other, shortage of supply in the United States and hence higher prices.

The most important thing for America to protect in case of an international emergency is the American flag—American interests, American rights, American prestige. The beet-sugar gentlemen do not seem to have great confidence in the efficacy of the United States Navy to protect American interests overseas. Gentlemen, let me remind you that America's problem of defending the lines of ocean communications between the United States and the Philippines is infinitesimal in comparison with similar problems of England, with which country America, theoretically at least, maintains a naval parity.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any questions?

Mr. VILLAMIN. May I ask for just one minute more?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman wants a few minutes I think he should have it. What he is saying is not repetition, but new matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the time of the gentleman will be extended two minutes.

Mr. VILLAMIN. I was going to say that the consuming power of the United States has a wonderful elasticity. During the World War, by direction of the then Food Administrator, Herbert Hoover, the sugar consumption was reduced by as much as 50 per cent of normal. The United States revealed a tremendous Hooverizing quality. Where, I ask, in view of this formidable truth, is the seriousness of possible depreciation in sugar supply in war time represented by the relatively insignificant importations from the Philippines?

I desire now to talk about the alleged competition of the Philippines with beet sugar. It is all fiction. Not a single pound of Philippine sugar enters the beet-sugar territory. In the first place, there is not enough of that sugar entering this country; in the second place, the overland freight rates from the ports of entry to the territory are absolutely prohibitive.

Mr. Chairman, I do not blame the beet-sugar people, because they are in business to make money, but only last year they vigorously opposed the barge bill in Congress because it provided for a cheaper and better transportation system on the Mississippi and its tributaries tapping the beet-sugar territory. I repeat, I don't blame them for that, but when they tell this committee of the "Philippine menace" in the offing I am reminded of that ancient hyperbole in Homer's Iliad of the miserable mouse being born after the laboring of the mountains and the grand expectations.

Let me say a few words now on the potentiality of sugar production of the Philippines.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has again expired.

Mr. VILLAMIN. I am going to say something which has never been said before * * *. I was going respectfully to challenge Mr. TIMBERLAKE * * *.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any questions?

Mr. CROWTHER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the time of the gentleman is extended three minutes.

Mr. VILLAMIN. Many thanks. They say if you permit the Philippines to expand her economic activities unrestrictedly American capital in sizeable amounts will flow thither and the time would soon come when they could produce an enormous amount of sugar. This is my reply: If you make the Philippine political status definite this American capital, which, by the way, I want to see in the hands of the Filipinos in the same way as Americans used British capital in the past, will go to the development of rubber and other undeveloped non-competing industries.

We are almost compelled under prevailing conditions and circumstances to go in the sugar business, for that is a well-established, centuries-old business where reasonable profits are made; and we are kept away by uncertainty from starting those noncompetitive industries which I mentioned in the early part of my statement here.

The Timberlake resolution will add enormously to the already uncertain political status of the Philippines. To him who would analyze that measure in this light it will become evident that while it will be a bomb to the Philippine sugar industry it will be a boomerang to the beet-sugar interests. Both sides will lose, and it is uneconomic.

Yesterday, out in the lobby, Mr. Lippitt, the vice president of the Great Western Sugar Co., said to me: "We are giving you people good advice. It is the idea of diversification." I told him we were not taking many advices from our adversaries. And there is no hard feeling in that, Mr. Lippitt.

Diversification, gentlemen, is the talismanic word that hopeless politicians and hopeful candidates hand out to the farmers when a farm question reaches an impasse. We have in the Philippines already a reasonably well-balanced agricultural diversification. Can you imagine that even Hawaii and Cuba are advising us to diversify? Those two countries need that advice for themselves infinitely more than the Philippines, and they know it perfectly well.

We are told, "Sell your sugar in the Orient." Oriental countries are tariff inclosed. Their tariff walls are higher than in the United States. We are not able to compete with Java, which dominates the oriental markets now. The only way to compete with Java is to reduce our production costs vertically and horizontally to the Javanese level, and that spells the reduction of our standard of living to the plane of the coolie labor in Java, whose daily wage is 20 cents or less. That, gentlemen, means the complete undoing and annihilation of the 30 years of work by America in the Philippines of economic amelioration and social regeneration. Is this not worth thinking about?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. Are there any questions?

Mr. TREADWAY. I would like to ask the gentleman his official position.

Mr. VILLAMIN. I have no official position. I am a lawyer. I have engaged in the study of economics, finance, and international affairs during the last 10 years. I am untrammelled and unhampered by official representation, political consideration, or candidatorial commitment. I discuss this question objectively on its merits, and on them alone.

May I add, Mr. TREADWAY, that, modestly, in the teeth of opposition and misapprehension, I am leading the movement for deferred separation from America for purely Filipino reasons, the principal one being the commercial advantages that we derive from our association with this country. My conviction is when we shall have established a strong economic structure for our country our independence will have become maintainable and its advent will have been accelerated.

The CHAIRMAN. The witness will please answer the questions without expatiation.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would like a little expatiation.

The CHAIRMAN. It is all at the expense of the time of the other witnesses.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think it is very interesting. I would like to ask another question, if you do not mind, Mr. Chairman.

At the very beginning of your remarks, perhaps you explain more in detail just what you refer to as the uncertain status—I heard you use those words. I would like to know more about that.

Mr. VILLAMIN. It is simply this: The beet-sugar producers who are not constitutional lawyers have affirmed here that the Philippines are a foreign country. That's not so, gentlemen. By the unbroken line of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States the Philippines, though not an integral part of this country, is, nevertheless, an insular possession and not foreign to it. The Filipinos are neither citizens of nor foreigners to the United States. They are a legal conundrum, a political exclamation mark, an international anomaly. But the overshadowing fact is the Philippines are under the American flag as fully and as completely as the Capitol or the White House.

Mr. Chairman, I see your gavel is about to descend. Just half a minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. You asked for 5 minutes and you have been on the stand for 15 minutes. I am only suggesting this in fairness to the other witnesses.

Mr. VILLAMIN. We are fighting against tremendous odds.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I would like to ask the gentleman if, in revising his remarks, as he will have a chance to do, he will state the sources of the data and statistics bearing on the brief references that he made in his remarks?

Mr. VILLAMIN. With pleasure, Congressman.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have him elaborate still further his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Let him elaborate them in his extension.

Mr. TREADWAY. I say in his extension in the record, in his written brief. I would like to have elaborated somewhat in reference to the relations between the United States and the Philippines and give a description of his reference to the "uncertain status." Further, his references to Philippine independence.

Mr. VILLAMIN. I have an article published in the Saturday Evening Post covering the point.

Gentlemen, I do not want to be cut off on the statement of my position on Philippine independence. I am opposed to immediate and complete independence now because of the economic advantages we enjoy which, as I said before, is the only thing that will speed the dawning of the day of our coveted independence.

If the limitation principle is adopted, that will knock off the bottom of my argument and render my position on the independence question untenable. Under that impact, if I am sincere and consistent, I should reverse myself and become an independence advocate. That I will do without hesitation and without reservation if America commits the colossal contradiction which the Timberlake resolution has in contemplation.

Mr. GARNER. I want to make a suggestion: If we are to retain the Philippines indefinitely, had they not better be brought under the Territorial laws and made a part of the United States as a Territory?

Mr. VILLAMIN. I am against the indefinite retention of the Philippines by the United States. I stand firmly on that as a principle.

The United States, I conceive, is under a binding moral obligation to prepare the Filipinos for nationhood and help them acquire, when the time of separation comes, a reasonable chance to exist in tolerable tranquillity, security, and prosperity. The Timberlake resolution will prevent the consummation of that great and glorious hope.

CLAIMS INCIDENT TO EXPLOSION AT THE NAVAL AMMUNITION DEPOT, LAKE DENMARK, N. J.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12236, with Senate amendments, concur in the Senate amendments, and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12236, with Senate amendments, to concur in the Senate amendments, and pass the bill. The Clerk will report the bill with the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12236) to provide an appropriation for the payment of claims of persons who suffered property damage, death, or personal injury due to the explosion at the naval ammunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. J., July 10, 1926.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Do the amendments in any way cover insurance companies?

Mr. ACKERMAN. They have been deducted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

PENSIONS

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 14800, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amenndments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 14800, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. SNELL. Is that a pension bill?

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14800) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers, sailors, and marines of said war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this agreeable to the minority members of the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It is. I have just had a conference with the ranking member.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD, Mr. ELLIOTT, and Mr. GREENWOOD.

MAJ. WILLIAM P. WILSON

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the omnibus bill H. R. 16522, which granted a pension to Marie T. Wilson, widow of Maj. William P. Wilson, late of the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, who died while in the line of duty November 27, 1927.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSON. Major Wilson's work was most important and his contribution to the national defense was of the greatest moment, through his untiring efforts in the perfecting of an antiaircraft fire-control instrument. One of the greatest problems in connection with our aircraft defense has been that of obtaining a high degree of accuracy for our antiaircraft guns. Major Wilson's wonderful success in designing such an instrument is of international significance. As matters now stand, our Army is in a position to protect our citizen homes against an aircraft attack.

Major Wilson has, since the World War, unremittingly given himself to the task and has given every ounce of his nerve and energy to the perfection and completion of this great invention.

In this connection I want to read from Col. C. E. Kilbourne, Coast Artillery Corps; Maj. Gen. C. C. Williams, Chief of Ordnance; and Maj. O. L. Spiller, Coast Artillery Corps, their estimate of this man's great work for his Nation:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF COAST ARTILLERY,
Washington.

* * * * * * *

During the war, antiaircraft gunfire, while it improved somewhat toward the close, was relatively ineffective. The fire had to be so conducted that the projectiles would burst, not where the plane was when observed, but where it would be after the piece was loaded and fired and the projectile reached the plane. This involved:

First. Determining the position in altitude and direction of the plane.

Second. Determining its course and speed.

Third. From these determining where the plane would be at the end of the loading and the time of flight of the projectile, which time of flight itself depended upon the future position of the plane.

Fourth. Determining the fuze setting that would cause the projectile to burst at the proper instant.

When the speed of a plane is considered (40 to 50 yards a second) you may grasp the complications of the problem and the importance of shortening all operations preceding the actual firing of the piece. For example, an error of 5 yards in determining the course of the plane during 1 second, would result in an error of 50 yards at the end of 10 seconds, leaving the plane still within the danger zone of the bursting shell. But if the time between the computations and the burst were 30 seconds the error would be 150 yards; if 1 minute elapsed, the error would become 300 yards; in either of these last the burst would be ineffective.

It was essential therefore that a system be developed by which the instruments would automatically predict the future position of the plane continuously, and that these predictions should be automatically converted into elevation and direction for the gun and into the correct fuze setting. Furthermore, it was essential that these data should be instantly indicated to those operating the gun and the fuze setter so that they, by merely keeping certain indices on the gun and fuze setter, opposite corresponding indices actuated by electric impulse from the controlling instruments, could maintain continuous and accurate fire.

It was to this problem Major Wilson addressed himself. He utilized, of course, all he could glean from similar efforts in foreign armies. But the instrument he designed, and which we have adopted for our service, is purely his own. Not only will his instrument operate for a plane moving on a straight course but will predict for a plane moving on a regular curve. It will not predict for an erratic course, but you must remember that planes of high maneuverability are targets for the smaller automatic weapons. That bombing planes, for protection against which the antiaircraft cannon are provided, are heavy and incapable of sudden changes of course—furthermore that, if prevented from flying toward their objective on a fairly straight course, their bombs can not be dropped upon that objective. For these bombing planes, therefore, Major Wilson's device solves our problem.

It was tested out at the Aberdeen proving ground last fall and so conclusively proved itself that our Ordnance Department was prepared, upon conclusion of the tests, to go ahead with the final design of the instrument. Some improvements were indicated as desirable and on these Major Wilson was putting the final touches when he died of heart failure.

Combined with his genius was an intense devotion to duty that won the respect, and a modesty and consideration for others that won the love of his comrades and fellow workers.

Sincerely yours,

C. E. KILBOURNE,
Colonel, Coast Artillery Corps.

Major Wilson served at Frankford Arsenal for nearly four years prior to his death. During the greater part of this time he was in charge of the optical and instrument laboratories and the fire-control design section. The period of Major Wilson's incumbency was one of great activity and rapid development. Great strides were being made in perfecting the new types of antiaircraft and mobile artillery leading to the standardization of nearly all the improved types and calibers. A most important part of any artillery development is the provision of accurate means for directing and controlling the fire. Practically all of the new sighting systems, seacoast fire-control apparatus, and ballistic computing devices were designed under the direction and close personal supervision of Major Wilson.

The most noteworthy example of this officer's work, and the one that best illustrates his outstanding technical ability and inventive genius, is the antiaircraft fire-control director TI. The work of designing this instrument was started in 1924 and carried forward continuously until his death. The instruments in use at the time this development was started were comparatively crude affairs, very similar to the ones improvised during the war. They were inherently inaccurate and unsatisfactory. All types were based on assumptions and approximations designed to simplify the computing problem, but necessarily introducing inaccuracies seriously affecting the value of the computed data.

Major Wilson, disregarding all precedent, attacked the problem from an entirely new angle and succeeded before his death in developing an instrument theoretically and by actual firing test superior to any similar purpose instrument in existence.

In order to appreciate the difficulties of this work it is essential that the problem be at least partially understood. The target is moving at a high rate of speed through space. Its position with respect to the battery is constantly changing in three dimensions. The gun must be pointed sufficiently in advance of the target in order that the projectile and the target will meet, and the fuze must be so timed as to burst the projectile at that instant. Variations in muzzle velocity, wind, atmospheric density, and drift must all be accurately computed, and the necessary corrections applied to the firing data. All of this must be done continuously and automatically.

The director, which is essentially a supercomputing machine, solves all the geometrical and ballistic problems involved. It automatically computes the future position of the target based on the angular rates of change in azimuth and elevation; it automatically multiplies these rates by the time of flight of the projectile. It automatically applies all the ballistic corrections; thus the instrument is able to give continuously the azimuth, quadrant elevation, and fuze range, corresponding to the future position of the target. These data are transmitted automatically to the guns. The guns are trained by traversing and elevating in such manner as to keep two moving pointers in coincidence. Sights and range drums are eliminated from the carriage. It is not necessary that the manning personnel of the guns see the target. A machine that will do all this is necessarily very intricate and complicated. A high degree of precision is necessary in its design and construction.

Other antiaircraft projects worked out under Major Wilson's direction include a sighting system that is vastly superior to preceding types; a machine gun data computer and several types of machine-gun sights. His contributions to seacoast artillery fire control are numerous and include the development of the cloke plotting and relocating board, which is now standard for all long-range batteries; an improved range-correction board, a percentage corrector, and the new standard long-range depression position finder.

His work for the field artillery covers such items as new sights and sight mounts for the 105 mm. howitzer, the 75 mm. gun, the 75 mm. pack howitzer, the 75 mm. infantry mortar, and the 37 mm. infantry gun. The sighting system for the mount first mentioned incorporates certain new and valuable features which make it superior to any similar foreign development. The other sights compare favorably with the new developments in other countries.

C. C. WILLIAMS,
Major General, Chief of Ordnance.

The first knowledge I had of Major Wilson's interest in this type of development was in the summer of 1920 when I saw him at Aberdeen Proving Ground. He questioned me at great length concerning the types of fire-control instruments in use by the allied armies during the World War and the relative efficiency of each. I was able to give him considerable data along this line for the reason that I served in the antiaircraft service in France and had occasion to visit various allied antiaircraft units at the front as well as in training centers where officers were instructed in the theory of antiaircraft fire control.

The next year, 1921, when I was in Washington on official business, Major Wilson again talked with me on the subject and I found that he had acquired a most thorough knowledge of the theory of antiaircraft fire and of all the principles involved, and, also, that he knew the mechanical details of all of the instruments used in the allied armies, and understood thoroughly their weak points. At this time Major Wilson informed me that he had in mind a "central control instrument" which would overcome all the mechanical defects that were experienced in operating the war instruments and would be correct in principle. However, he had considerable doubt that he could make the machine work. I found out later through further acquaintance and conversation with Major Wilson that this last remark of his was prompted more by his modesty than by actual fear that the instrument would not be a success. After this I saw Major Wilson at intervals of about six months until he completed his instrument in 1926. I can not say exactly how much of his time he devoted to the study and design of this instrument, but I know that during this five years he was continually studying the antiaircraft problem, making and remaking parts of the apparatus many times in order to obtain the performance at which he was aiming.

Although he received ideas and suggestions from many people and made use of the ideas which were applied by others during the war, it may be safely said that Major Wilson's design was absolutely original and the principles he applied to determine the firing data were entirely different from those employed in any other instrument.

Some of the objectionable features of the war instruments were that they were inaccurate, slow, and based on too many assumptions as to the course, speed, and expected maneuver of the airplane. Neither were they provided with means in the instrument for correcting for the effect of wind, drift, and change in muzzle velocity. These last-named variations are very common and should be taken care of by any instrument before it can approach accuracy. In Major Wilson's instrument practically all of these were overcome. The instrument was accurate, was speedy in operation, and contained means for correcting for variations in wind, drift, and muzzle velocity. There would be no comparison whatever between the performance of a 4-gun battery firing at an airplane using the best of the war-time instruments and the same battery using the Wilson instrument. With the latter the fire would be considerably faster and so much more accurate that it would be apparent to the casual observer not familiar with the principles of antiaircraft fire.

Major, Coast Artillery Corps.

FIRST DIFICIENCY BILL, 1929

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice to the House that to-morrow morning, after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of business on the Speaker's table, I shall ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the first deficiency bill, 1929.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. With twenty million and odd dollars put on by the Senate.

ELLIS ISLAND

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to a censorship of the press brought about by a minor official of the United States Government, the Commissioner of Immigration at Ellis Island.

Now, there is a tendency in this country on the part of a few unimportant people to abolish the great American institution of freedom of speech and free press, and here and there a petty official in a minor office is found willing to carry out this purpose. A few days ago there arrived at Ellis Island an English boy, a stowaway, on the steamer Lancastna. He arrived with both feet frozen. Under the law, of course, the boy can not be admitted. The deportation is mandatory. A daily newspaper in New York City sent one of its reporters to Ellis Island to interview this boy, and admission to newspaper men was refused by the Commissioner of Immigration.

That naturally causes to arise a suspicion as to the condition of the Government institution at Ellis Island.

Gentlemen, I worked there 21 years ago under Commissioner Watchorn, and the island was so conducted at that time that newspaper men were admitted at all times, and everything that was going on there was open to the inspection of the public. I now charge that there must be something very rotten at Ellis Island to prompt the Commissioner of Immigration passing a rule or censorship preventing representatives of the press from going on the island and seeing people.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In a moment.

Gentlemen well know that the press has access to Government institutions, hospitals, penal institutions, and departments; and it is not only improper but contrary to the very principle of our Government to establish a censorship of that kind.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the gentleman served there under a Democratic administration, while now we are under Republican rule.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no. Robert Watchorn was then the Commissioner of Immigration and Oscar Straus and Charles Nagle were the Secretaries of Commerce and Labor during my time, both Republicans.

Mr. BLANTON. But it was under a Democratic administration.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Twenty years ago Oscar Straus was Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and a more humane and able man never served in that capacity. I want to take this opportunity of advising and serving notice that I shall start an investigation of Ellis Island of my own, and if there is anything there that Mr. Day thinks he can hide by reason of his censorship, I will bring it to light. [Applause.]

RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 278, a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 278

Resolved, That Rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives be amended by inserting a new paragraph following paragraph 2, which shall be known as paragraph 2a, and shall read as follows:

"2a. Whenever a committee reports a bill or a joint resolution repealing or amending any statute or part thereof it shall include in its report or in an accompanying document—

"(1) The text of the statute or part thereof which is proposed to be repealed; and

"(2) A comparative print of that part of the bill or joint resolution making the amendment and of the statute or part thereof proposed to be amended, showing by stricken-through type and italics, parallel columns, or other appropriate typographical devices the omissions and insertions proposed to be made."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, the resolution which has just been read from the Clerk's desk is one to amend an existing rule, Rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives. This proposed rule has been the subject of informal discussion among the Members of the House for a number of years. I have discussed on the floor of the House this proposed rule a number of times. The amendment to the rule as it is before you now has been carefully considered by the parliamentary clerk, the legislative counsel of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Rules, and a large number of the membership of this House. The Committee on Rules unanimously reported this resolution as proposing a proper amendment to the House rules.

The proposal in this new rule is simply this: Many bills which are introduced are to amend statutes. Such bills are reported back to the House, and there is nothing either in the bill or in the report accompanying the bill to advise Members of the House just what specific changes the bill proposes to make in the statute under consideration. If this amendment to Rule XIII is adopted, then hereafter a committee which reports a bill to amend an existing statute must show in the report just what changes are proposed. Suppose a bill is to amend a statute—we will just call it section 100—by omitting some words and adding thereto other words. The proposal is that the report shall show by stricken-through type the words to be omitted and by italics the words that are added, so that a Member who is interested in knowing just what changes it is proposed to make in the statute under consideration can get the report, read it, and have before him exactly the changes which are proposed to be made. Personally, I have followed this practice as to all bills I have been authorized to report from the committees on which I served, and the reports which accompanied such bills showed exactly the changes which were to be made. Some members from other committees have also followed this practice, but I do not know that any one committee has followed this practice.

We want here by a general rule to enforce that practice on every committee that reports out a bill proposing to repeal or amend any statute or part thereof. It will greatly aid Members who desire to follow legislation in knowing exactly what changes are proposed, and it will enable them to acquaint themselves with the changes that are proposed by reading the committee report. Very often we have bills before us to amend section so-and-so to read as follows. It occurs occasionally the gentlemen who have charge of such a bill can only say in a general way what the effect of the proposed changes will be. They appear on the floor without even the code, the Statutes at Large, or anything else which will enable them to answer questions as to what specific changes are proposed. Under this rule such questions will be answered specifically in the report before the bill is called up for consideration on the floor of the House. I think it will greatly aid in orderly legislation. Many of the State legislatures now require proposed changes in statutes be shown either in the reports accompanying bills or in the bills themselves.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. The Public Lands Committee, for instance, last week reported a bill of some two pages in which but one word was to be changed, and the most of the bill was a long description of land to be added to a forest reserve. Now, would it be necessary to print the entire bill, or would it be sufficient to indicate the change to be made?

Mr. RAMSEYER. It would be sufficient to indicate only the change to be made, and the second paragraph of the resolution covers that:

A comparative print of that part of the bill or joint resolution making the amendment.

It would not be necessary to print the entire bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I was not here when the gentleman began his statement. Is it contemplated that when a bill is reported amending a section of an existing statute that the entire section shall be repeated and then that the new matter shall be italicized? That is a very convenient method of legislation, and is required by the constitutions of a great many States.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is the practice in some of the States. I have bills in my pocket showing the practice followed in the State of New York, and a similar practice is followed in Vermont, Pennsylvania, and, I think, in Virginia. Since this matter has been up for discussion among Members of the House I have heard of at least 12 or 15 States in which the changes proposed to be made must be shown in the bill itself or in the accompanying report, as this rule requires.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. At the present time, very often a bill is reported here which provides, for instance, that a certain section of an existing statute shall be amended by adding certain words.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And you have to consult the statute that is in existence and perhaps many preceding statutes to ascertain the effect of the proposed amendment. This rule would not meet that case, would it?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes; this rule meets your case. This rule would require that statute to be amended, be printed in the report together with the words to be added printed in italics, so you could see at a glance the proposed change.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Set out in the bill or in the report?

Mr. RAMSEYER. In the report.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. But not in the bill?

Mr. RAMSEYER. No; this rule does not contemplate any change in the existing practice in regard to printing bills. The accompanying report must show the proposed changes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I hope some time the gentleman may consider going a step further and proposing that the bill itself shall reenact the section that is involved, so anybody at a glance can see exactly what change is made in existing law.

Mr. RAMSEYER. There is merit to the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HUDSON. That was the point I wanted to bring out. The bills are laid upon our desk, and we have then the first notice of proposed legislation. It seems to me, as is the practice in the State of Michigan, the bill ought to carry in brackets the part of the statute that is to be eliminated and in italics the proposed amendment; then we would have notice before referring to the report of the committee.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is the practice in many States, but there are so many bills introduced here and so few reported out it was thought at least for a starter we had better limit ourselves to showing the changes in the bills that are actually reported and show those changes in the reports accompanying the bills.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. NEWTON. The purpose, of course, is to inform the membership of the House as to what the original act is and the proposed changes, so that each Member will know them. It seems to me this can be done as effectively by the method proposed here in the rule, to have this embodied in the report, as it would be to have it in the bill itself.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I think so.

Mr. NEWTON. I know that on most of the bills our committee has reported out amending the interstate commerce act; we have followed that practice in the report.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I know that the gentleman from Minnesota, who is now interrogating me, has followed that practice in the bills he has reported which proposed changes in existing statutes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Iowa five additional minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, the gentleman's rule will be of great help to some of us who work on the Consent Calendar, but I think it is important that the gentleman should embody in his remarks a warning to the drafters of bills amending existing laws or statutes not to use line references in amending bills, such references as "the fifth" or the "seventh line" of the second paragraph or "after the semicolon in the tenth line." Such language has become quite customary. Especially is this true of the Navy Department and the War Department, where many of these bills are drafted. They may be working from a particular edition which they have before them and the lining changes in each edition or print of the law. References should be by sections and by quoting sufficiently from the law as to make the amendment clear. Therefore, for the sake of good and proper legislation the amendment should show the certain word in a certain section that is to be stricken out and show what is to be inserted in lieu thereof and the complete amended section. We have considerable trouble with a reference to a certain line, when we are all working with different editions of the law. The best form is to provide, for example: "That the section as amended shall read as follows."

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman's warning is well taken, and I adopt it now as my own, giving the gentleman, however, due credit of authorship.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. The resolution applies only to bills and joint resolutions. What does the gentleman think of having it broad enough to apply also to House resolutions from the gentleman's Committee on Rules that have to do with substantive changes in the rules? Would it not be wise to have this same regulation apply to the Rules Committee in such cases? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAMSEYER. Well, I am trying to recall whether such a situation as that to which the gentleman now refers has ever arisen.

Mr. CRAMTON. The situation has arisen in a rather conspicuous recent instance, and I wondered whether the failure of the Committee on Rules, having reported this resolution to apply to all other committees of the House, to include language that would apply to themselves was based on their realization that they would themselves abide by the reform without any such requirement.

Mr. RAMSEYER. No. The Committee on Rules, of course, never gave the thought embodied in the gentleman's suggestion any consideration. The rules are simple propositions in comparison with our statute laws. The rules of the House are much more easily found and can be very readily compared; every Member on the floor of the House is entitled to have them before him. I am sure that the Members of the House feel there is no necessity for making this rule applicable to resolutions reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CRAMTON. Do I understand from the gentleman's statement that the Rules Committee does not feel that they ought to follow this practice that they are prescribing for all other committees?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The Rules Committee has not given it any thought. The Rules Committee, so far as I know, has in the past, and will in the future, I am sure, make very plain to the House membership any changes proposed to the rules of the House so as to make it perfectly clear to the gentleman from Michigan and others interested what it is proposed to be changed in any existing rule.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. What would be the effect if the committee failed to comply?

Mr. RAMSEYER. If the committee failed to comply with the rules of the House?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; with the rule with reference to the report of the bill?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The rule requires bills of a certain kind to be accompanied by a report showing certain things.

Mr. DENISON. Suppose the committee should bring in a report and not comply with the rule. Would a point of order lie?

Mr. RAMSEYER. That will be determined by the Speaker if that situation should arise. My own opinion is that a point of order would lie.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SNELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the rule reported by the gentleman from Iowa, although I think it is far from what the House needs. It deals only with bills and resolutions introduced in the House. But instead of being a House rule this ought, in my opinion, to be a bill which, when made a law, would be applicable to all bills and resolutions introduced in either the House or the Senate.

I did not know that the gentleman from Iowa had introduced the rule now before us, when on December 6 I introduced a bill to amend chapter 6, title 44, of the United States Code by inserting a new section to be known as section 189–a, which provides that any bill or resolution proposing an amendment to any existing statute or to the Constitution shall have matter to be stricken out printed with a line drawn through the same and new matter printed in italics; and provides also that the provisions of the proposed new section shall govern the printing of amendments to bills, resolutions, joint resolutions, and memorials so far as applicable.

These provisions of the bill I introduced are found in the statutes of Wisconsin, and in those of other States. The language is clear, definite, not to be misunderstood. It provides that proposed amendments to bills and to resolutions shall be printed in one way and in one way only. But I notice that the rule submitted by the gentleman from Iowa provides that the committee shall include in its report—

(2) A comparative print of that part of the bill or joint resolution making the amendment and of the statute or part thereof proposed to be amended, showing by stricken-through type and italics, parallel columns, or other appropriate typographical devices the omissions and insertions proposed to be made.

Now that, I think, is very far from being as specific and exact as it ought to be. Indeed, it is not specific, definite, at all. It would allow committees to report bills and amendments in either of three different and dissimilar ways—that is, by "stricken-through type and italics," or by "parallel columns," or by "other appropriate devices," leaving to the imagination what these "devices" may be.

There should be not a mere House rule on this important subject, but a law applicable to bills in either House or Senate commanding that the matter to be stricken out shall be printed with a line drawn through it, and that the new matter shall be printed in italics. That is all that is necessary, and it has long worked perfectly in actual practice in Wisconsin and other States.

I trust the gentleman from Iowa will consent to such an amendment to the proposed rule, because there could not then be the slightest objection to it except that it does not, can not, apply to Senate bills. But if the rule is to leave it discretionary with committees to report amendments in either of three different ways it will not meet the situation.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. In view of the fact that we have some bills like the Judicial Code, should not there be some leeway?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In reference to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Michigan, I will say that in the original copy of my bill there was a clause expressly excepting from its provisions bills for a general revision of the laws (the Judicial Code), but it was inadvertently omitted from the copy introduced in the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That exception is in the statutes of Wisconsin, and I intended to present that identical amendment to the committee having my bill before it.

Mr. MICHENER. I might say that when the matter was before the Committee on Rules, I was of the same opinion. I insisted on this rule being made absolutely definite.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It ought to be.

Mr. MICHENER. With no leeway, so that all reports would be uniform, so that there could be no question; but after giving the matter mature thought, and applying the theory to the House practice, I feel that it is entirely advisable to pass this resolution allowing some discretion.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Right there, let me say to the gentleman from Michigan that the statutes of Wisconsin and of other States specifically provide that the law respecting the printing of amendments shall not be applicable to a bill for a general revision of the statutes. Such a revision comes only once in many years. It is always very voluminous and involved, and should be exempted from the provisions of the law governing the printing of amendments.

Mr. MICHENER. For instance, take the Sherman antitrust law. That is a very lengthy statute. Little bills are introduced now and then which affect certain sections of that law, probably two or more. Would the gentleman think it advisable in such a bill to print the entire Sherman antitrust law, which is a large pamphlet?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think that anything which would inform the House ought to be printed. A bill should be printed, the parts to be eliminated stricken through, and the amendments printed in italics, so that anybody reading the bill and the report will understand precisely what is intended. Otherwise, you compel an elaborate study and comparison such as it is impossible for the Members of the House to give to the thousands of measures pending before Congress.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, practically all of the suggestions that have been made on the floor of the House here to-day relative to these changes in the rules have been considered by the Committee on Rules, and they were considered very carefully. As a matter of fact, in the practical working out of these various matters there are a good many rules that will apply to State legislatures and work out satisfactorily, that will not apply in the National Congress on account of the difference in procedure and the wide application of measures considered. We do not know that this rule is perfect in every respect, and make no such claims, but we think it is a step in the right direction, and is a rule that is in keeping with the desire of a majority of the Members of the House; that is, that we try something along this line. It may be necessary a little later to change or amend this rule, but we think that it is as definite and distinct in its application as we feel like recommending to the House at the present time. I do not know but that some of the suggestions made here to-day will eventually be considered as desirable and be incorporated in the rule, but at the present time, from the careful consideration that we have given it, and it was discussed very carefully for some length of time in the committee, we feel this is as far as we ought to go in recommending to the House at the present time. Intentionally we did not desire to make the rule too drastic at first, and until we knew how it would work out in the everyday procedure of the House.

I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for the adoption of this rule and the mechanical working of the rule, if adopted, have been clearly stated by the gentleman from Iowa

[Mr. RAMSEYER], the author of the amendment to the rule. I think the rule will go a long way in meeting a situation that many Members of the House have recognized heretofore as being very necessary to correct in order to expedite better consideration of bills when amendments are proposed to existing statutes. It is true that the rule might go further in its provisions, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], but it will be noticed from a reading of the proposed change in the rules that quite a large latitude is allowed by way of discretion to the members of a committee as to the method they shall employ in pointing out the changes that are proposed in existing law.

It does not set down any hard and fast rule or iron-bound rule of mechanical printing, so to speak, but gentlemen will observe that it allows alternative methods to be used in the judgment of a committee to set out fairly by these three methods proposed what the existing text of the statute is and what the proposed change is in that statute. This objection was urged to the proposal requiring all bills when introduced to show the changes suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I think it is rather a sound objection. At each session of the Congress some 15,000 or 20,000 bills are introduced. Many of them involve proposed amendments to existing law. To print them in that way would necessarily very largely increase the cost of printing bills and the time used in preparation. It was thought by the Committee on Rules, as a matter of experiment, I might call it evolution, that at least for the present we should make the requirements relate only to bills actually considered by committees and reported out of the committees to be placed upon the calendars of the House. We thought that would give Members fair opportunity, without having the textbooks of existing law before them, to make an off-hand comparison to see in a practical-sense way what are the proposed changes in existing law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The rule, if adopted in its present form, gives any committee the option to report a suggested amendment in either of three or four different ways, and there will be nothing like uniformity in the reporting of measures by committees. There ought to be an absolute mandatory requirement that every committee in reporting a bill shall report an amendment with the parts to be eliminated stricken through and the proposed amendment in italics.

Then there could not be opportunity for mistake.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, I think that suggestion has been answered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], and the Committee on Rules candidly confesses to the House it does not recognize this as the last word, probably, on that proposition. But we think for the present at least the committee certainly went a long ways to correct a situation which I think the gentleman realizes ought to have been corrected long ago.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will allow me to suggest right there, I have seen some very cunning things done in reporting bills, and sometimes 90 per cent of the House deceived as a result of such cunning——

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is for that very purpose we are bringing in this rule.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will permit, line 14 says that the committee may indicate the amendment through "other appropriate typographical devices." The expression "other appropriate typographical devices" is very ambiguous and may permit the cunning of a Member, if he wishes to exercise it, to so report an amendment as to deceive the ordinary reader.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am unwilling to admit that any committee of this House would deliberately bring in a bill deliberately conceived for the purpose of deceiving the House and engage in that species of cunning to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. VESTAL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will.

Mr. VESTAL. I have thought—of course, I am for this rule; I think it is a step forward; but it seems to me that the rule ought to go a little further, so that the bills reported from a committee, all bills reported from a committee ought to carry the full language of the statute sought to be amended, and the statute as amended, in the bill reported as well as in the report, not in the bill as proposed to the House, but in the bill as reported back to the House for action, and it seems to me that that bill ought to carry the same language the report carries.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say if that appeals to the gentleman from Iowa or the chairman of the committee, of course, they can yield for that purpose to offer an amendment, but I do not know they will do so. I would not be inclined to yield further on the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, only one word. It was not the idea of the Committee on Rules to make this a limited mandatory rule in the beginning. We wanted to work it out so that we can go in the direction that so many Members of the House have expressed a desire at various times. We discussed that very carefully, left it open to a certain amount of discretion, and as soon as we see how this works, if it works in the right direction, we will make a rule perhaps more mandatory. But it was the opinion of the committee, this was as far as we ought to go at the present time.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman is one of the best parliamentarians and I want to ask him a question for the enlightenment of the rest of us here. This provides three methods. One by stricken-through type and italics, by parallel columns, or other appropriate typographical devices. I want to ask the gentleman from New York, who is to be the judge of the appropriateness of typographical devices?

Mr. SNELL. To begin with, I should leave some discretion to the committee that makes the report, and if it is necessary to make other limitations in order to obtain the cooperation of the committees we can do that at a later time. You must remember this is more or less an experiment.

Mr. DENISON. Suppose a committee brings in a report on a bill using a typographical device which they think is appropriate, and some other Member of the House does not think is appropriate. What can you do about it?

Mr. SNELL. I do not know as we could do anything, and I do not anticipate any serious complications to arise from this. I believe the committees will cooperate and that is all we can ask at present. I have discovered that when amending the rules of the House you have to be very careful and do it by degrees. We want to be sure of our ground so far as we can be at the time, and it will not be a very serious proposition to again amend or cut out this rule, if we find we have made an error in what we have done.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Will this rule apply to appropriation bills?

Mr. SNELL. It will apply to all bills carrying any legislation. Appropriation bills are not supposed to carry any legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. If so, it will probably put the Committee on Appropriations out of legislative business, would it not?

Mr. SNELL. To a certain extent it may limit it.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I expected at this time to call up another privileged report from the Committee on Rules, relative to the reference of constitutional amendments. As the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], was unable to be here to-day, I shall not call it up at this time.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. It is to make an inquiry of my friend the chairman of the Committee on Rules with reference to the resolution just passed. I am in favor of it, but I was not in the House at the time the debate took place. I want to ask the gentleman one practical question with reference to it. If a committee should make a report without complying with it, what would be the effect? Would a point of order lie against the report of that committee?

Mr. SNELL. Well, it rather seems to me it would be up to the Speaker to determine that question. There are many rules that are always complied with in each particular.

Mr. CRISP. My inquiry was to bring out what was the intention of the Committee on Rules in that respect, thinking it would have some bearing on the decision of the Speaker in interpreting the rule in that regard.

Mr. SNELL. I think it would be up to the Speaker to decide that point of order, but at first I would expect he would be fairly liberal in his rulings along this line. It is pretty hard to draw a hard-and-fast rule on this important subject; but we thought we would try this out, and if it does not work in its present form, we will either amend it to meet the conditions that arise or abandon it altogether.

Mr. CRISP. I am in sympathy with the rule.

REGENTS OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 350.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 350) to provide for the reappointment of Frederic A. Delano and Irwin B. Laughlin as members of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution

Resolved, etc., That the vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, caused by the expiration of the terms of Frederic A. Delano, of the city of Washington, and Irwin B. Laughlin, of Pennsylvania, on January 21, 1929, be filled by the reappointment of the present incumbents for the statutory term of six years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, has this resolution been considered by the committee of the House?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes; by the Committee on the Library.

Mr. SCHAFER. Has the committee unanimously recommended its passage?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MAINTENANCE OF PUBLIC ORDER DURING INAUGURAL CEREMONIES

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up House Joint Resolution 386, now on the Union Calendar, relating to the protection of life and property and public safety during the inaugural ceremonies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 386) to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the presidential inaugural ceremonies in 1929.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, payable in like manner as other appropriations for the expenses of the District of Columbia, is hereby authorized to be appropriated to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to maintain public order and protect life and property in said District from the 28th of February to the 10th of March, 1929, both inclusive, including the employment of personal services, payment of allowances, traveling expenses, hire of means of transportation, cost of removing and relocating street-car loading platforms, and other incidental expenses in the discretion of the commissioners. Said commissioners are hereby authorized and directed to make all reasonable regulations necessary to secure such preservation of public order and protection of life and property, and to make special regulations respecting the standing, movement, and operating of vehicles of whatever character or kind during said period; and to grant under such conditions as they may impose special licenses to peddlers and vendors to sell goods, wares, and merchandise on the streets, avenues, and sidewalks in the District of Columbia, and to charge for such privilege such fees as they may deem proper.

Such regulations and licenses shall be in force one week prior to said inauguration, during said inauguration, and one week subsequent thereto, and shall be published in one or more of the daily newspapers published in the District of Columbia, and in such other manner as the commissioners may deem best to acquaint the public with the same; and no penalty prescribed for the violation of any of such regulations shall be enforced until five days after such publication. Any person violating any of such regulations shall be liable for each such offense to a fine not to exceed $100 in the police court of said District, and in default of payment thereof to imprisonment in the workhouse of said District for not longer than 60 days. And the sum of $2,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby likewise authorized, to be expended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the construction, rent, maintenance, and expenses incident to the operation of temporary public comfort stations, first-aid stations, and information booths, during the period aforesaid, including the employment of personal services.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some information about the resolution. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The resolution provides that:

Any person violating any of such regulations shall be liable for each such offense to a fine not to exceed $100 in the police court of said District, and in default of payment thereof to imprisonment in the workhouse of said District for not longer than 60 days.

Does the gentleman have in mind springing a sudden regulation upon the public so that a person may have absolutely no notice or knowledge of such regulation? The gentleman knows that ignorance of the law is no defense, because a person is presumed to know the law. Is not the gentleman going a little too far?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will state to the gentleman that under existing laws, 30 days' notice is required before a police regulation can be put into effect. This resolution removes that limitation so far as regulations governing the inauguration are concerned, but your committee is advised by the commissioners that they intend to publish the regulations relating to the inaugural ceremonies for the information of the public, but the limitation as to 30 days is removed by this resolution. This is a general resolution and it is in the form that has previously been adopted.

Mr. DYER. Is this similar to the resolution which was adopted four years ago?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will state to the gentleman that there was no extra appropriation made in 1924, but this is similar to the resolution adopted in 1920.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman know what regulations were made at that time?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. They had to do, as I recall, with the closing of certain streets and the roping off of certain streets. I can not remember all the regulations, but there were no drastic changes made in existing police regulations, as I recall.

Mr. SNELL. These are nothing more than general regulations to take care of a big crowd.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That is all the resolution provides for.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, it sounds more mysterious, I suppose, than it really is or is intended to be, and I suppose it is all right if they have no drastic regulations in mind, so that people who come to Washington to attend the inauguration might find themselves placed in the calaboose for the violation of something they did not know anything about.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from New York need not worry about that, because these will be just general regulations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 297, a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York calls up House Resolution 297, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 297

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 1731, to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for the consideration of Senate 1731, which has for its purpose the further development of vocational education in the rural communities of the several States of the Union. As the Members of the House well know, the Smith-Hughes Act, which was passed in 1917, I believe, authorized a continuing appropriation of $3,600,000 to be distributed among the various States for the purpose of vocational training in various schools. This fund was to be matched by funds contributed by the several individual States. This bill simply authorizes more money to be used for this same purpose and under the same conditions. At the present time about 29 per cent of the schools are taking advantage of this fund, and there seems to be a demand much larger than we are able to meet on account of the size of the appropriation. There seems to be a general demand, especially in the country districts, that they be allowed to take advantage of these appropriations, and have this vocational education in their schools, while the bill that is before the House at the present time provides for an appropriation of $500,000 and $500,000 each year for 11 years, and then a continuing appropriation for all time of $6,000,000 annually. The chairman of the Committee on Education will offer a committee amendment which will materially reduce that amount and also take out the continuing feature of the appropriation that is carried in the Senate bill. I will say to the Members of the House that this committee amendment is entirely satisfactory to the representatives of the vocational-training proposition.

A committee of that organization, from their convention in Philadelphia last month, came to Washington, and I want to say they are a fine, representative lot of men. I have never met a committee of men who appealed to me as more interested in their work, had a greater desire to cooperate in every way with Congress, and only ask for the things they ought to ask for, than was this committee; and I was very much impressed with the personnel of the committee and the work they are doing. The country districts are especially interested in this vocational educational training, and let me say to the Members of the House that this, in my judgment, is a real farm-relief measure, if anything could be considered as such, because it helps to educate the young boys and girls in the country districts in the questions that arise in the management and conduct of the farm industry. For that reason I believe it is very important and should be considered. As far as I know there is no opposition to this measure. It comes as a unanimous report from the Committee on Education and also from the Rules Committee. Unless there is some specific question, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 1731, to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories. Pending that motion, I would like to ask if there is any opposition to the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will say to the gentleman from New York that there might be some opposition to the amendment that is to be offered.

Mr. REED of New York. I wanted to know if there was any opposition to the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. How much time does the rule provide?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two hours; one hour on the side.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] has an amendment he desires to offer. Perhaps he would like to control a little time in his own right.

Mr. TARVER. No, Mr. Speaker; I have had a conference with the chairman of the committee and he has agreed to give me such time as I may desire.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that one hour of the time of general debate may be controlled by the chairman of the committee and one hour by the ranking Member on the Democratic side [Mr. LOWREY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the motion, the gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1731, with Mr. MAPES in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of providing for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, the sum of $500,000, and for each year thereafter, for 11 years, a sum exceeding by $500,000, the sum appropriated for each preceding year, and annually thereafter there is permanently authorized to be appropriated for each year the sum of $6,000,000. One-half of such sums shall be allotted to the States and Territories in the proportion that their farm population bears to the total farm population of the United States, exclusive of the insular possessions, according to the United States census last preceding the end of the fiscal year in which any such allotment is to be made, and shall be used for the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects in such States and Territories. The remaining half of such sums shall be allotted to the States and Territories in the proportion that their rural population bears to the total rural population of the United States, exclusive of the insular possessions, according to the United States census last preceding the end of the fiscal year in which any such allotment is to be made, and shall be used for the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors, development and improvement of home economics subjects in such States and Territories.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Federal Board for Vocational Education out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000 annually to be expended for the same purposes and in the same manner as provided in section 7 of the act approved February 23, 1917, as amended October 6, 1917.

SEC. 3. The appropriations made by this act shall be in addition to, and shall be subject to the same conditions and limitations as, the appropriations made by the act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and in the trades and industries; to provide cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditures," approved February 23, 1917, except that the appropriation made by this act for home economics shall be subject to the conditions and limitations applicable to the appropriation for agricultural purposes under such act of February 23, 1917, with the exception of that part of section 10 thereof which requires directed or supervised practice for at least six months per year, and that the appropriations available to the Federal Board of Vocational Education for salaries and expenses shall be available for expenses of attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations, which, in the opinion of the board, are necessary for the efficient discharge of its responsibilities.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think every Member in the House of Representatives is fairly familiar with the work that has been done during the last few years, or since 1917, under the Smith-Hughes Act.

This bill does not change the work at all. This bill simply proposes to carry the work that is now being done throughout the country along the lines of agricultural vocational training and home economics into those communities that want the service and can not obtain it on account of lack of Federal funds.

I want to state at the outset that I shall offer some amendments. This bill was introduced in the first instance by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MENGES]. Mr. MENGES deserves the credit for any merit there may be in this bill, but in order to have it properly drafted and to meet certain situations it was reported out as a committee bill under my name.

We tried to get a rule at the last session. There were quite a number of the men in the House who thought then and who think now that the original bill carried too large an appropriation; that is, carried an appropriation over too many years.

The Senate bill provides that there shall be an appropriation of $500,000 the first year, which shall be increased by $500,000 the next year and each year thereafter for 11 years, until the appropriation reaches $6,000,000 a year, and then it is to be a permanent appropriation of $6,000,000 a year. In order to have consideration of the bill at this time, and to meet a very serious situation so ably outlined by the chairman of the Rules Committee, the leaders in vocational work in the various States were called in to obtain their views. The matter was discussed with them, and an agreement was made to provide that the appropriation should continue for five years, that the first appropriation should be available for the year 1930 instead of 1929.

The reason we have adopted the Senate bill is because, inadvertently, in reporting out the House bill, the word "Territories" was omitted. This is included in the Senate bill.

The only changes in the bill which will be brought about by the amendments which I plan to offer are, first, to change the fiscal year in which the appropriation of $500,000 will become available to 1930 instead of 1929; second, to carry the appropriation for a period of five years instead of 11 years. At the end of five years it will be necessary, if more money is needed to carry on the work, to come back for a new authorization.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman give us just a brief description of how these funds are obtainable by the various schools and just what instruction is imparted in the expenditure of the funds?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes. When a local school desires to set up a school in a certain community different rules prevail in different States. Some of the high schools will have 10 boys who will want to take vocational work, or 15 or 25 boys. They may establish a rule in a certain State or locality, for instance, that if 10 boys or girls in the school desire vocational education, then the next thing is to start the department with a trained teacher. They make application to their State board of education for one of the trained teachers in vocational agriculture. The teacher goes there and takes hold of that class. The work involves six months' practical work on the farm; that is, the boy has to work with his father, supervised to a certain extent by the vocational teacher.

In answering the question I want to read just a little excerpt from a statement which was made to us by Doctor Lane at the hearings. I am very glad the gentleman from New York has asked the question, because it is a very practical one. Here is what Doctor Lane says:

> Every boy who elects to take the vocational work as part of his high-school education is required to carry on for at least six months at home some definite, practical work under the supervision of his teacher. Now, that means an economic return on the part of the boys in the production of livestock or crops or some other work around a farm.
> The total labor income from this practical work during the past five years was $23,637,924.25. This is not an estimate. It is based upon accurate cost accounting. For every dollar of Federal funds spent for vocational agriculture there was a financial return of $2.25 realized by the boys from their labor. The total Federal fund spent for salaries of teachers of vocational agriculture during the 5-year period was $10,418,460, and there was realized $23,637,924.25 from the practical work the boys did.

This is the character of the work.

The curriculum adopted in the various States and in the different localities is to meet the local situation. For instance, over in my district they have an agricultural school. The curriculum of the school is based upon the farm business in that locality, training them along that line. They are working with their fathers in harmony with the prevailing farm activities in that community.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then this fund provides additional teachers or is the money paid over to the school board?

Mr. REED of New York. No; every cent of this money is used for teachers.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. For teachers?

Mr. REED of New York. To provide the teachers for these schools throughout the country.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Who selects the teachers?

Mr. REED of New York. The State board of education or the local community, exactly the same as they would select any other teacher.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I will.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does Federal money pay the entire salaries of the teachers?

Mr. REED of New York. No; it varies in the different States. It is controlled by the States. In some States the community will pay one-third, the county may pay one-third, the town may pay one-third, or the city one-third, as the case may be. The State pays 50 per cent, and so on. That is all worked out by the State in cooperation with the Federal board.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. How many pupils do they have for one teacher?

Mr. REED of New York. That is left to the State board of education—in some cases we have 10, some 25, and so on.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. They might multiply the teachers indefinitely—get up a little group and get a teacher.

Mr. REED of New York. All the Federal Government has to do is to pay the sum over to the particular State and the State matches it, and then does as it pleases.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I will.

Mr. MILLER. Do these teachers come from the graduates of the various agricultural colleges?

Mr. REED of New York. In many cases they do.

Mr. HALL of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. HALL of Indiana. What about the use of this money as to its being divided between the larger cities and schools rather than the rural schools?

Mr. REED of New York. This will all be used for the rural schools.

Mr. HALL of Indiana. I wonder if there is any thought of liberalizing the rules of the educational board so that it will make it possible for the smaller schools to have this benefit? I happen to know that under the present rule it eliminates most of the smaller schools in the participation of this money. So the larger amount goes to the city schools.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman is speaking about the vocational schools in trades and industry.

Mr. HALL of Indiana. The gentleman thinks that there will be some loosening up of the rules?

Mr. REED of New York. No question about it. Now I want to give you a practical illustration. Here is the statement made by the State of Georgia. Of course what applies there will apply to most of the other States. Gentlemen know that a great many farms are being abandoned throughout the country.

The census of 1925 showed 61,000 fewer farms in operation in Georgia than when the 1920 census was taken. The Census Bureau took notice of the fact that in certain counties in the State of Georgia there was no marked decrease in the number of abandoned farms and wrote to the agricultural college in Georgia to ascertain the reason. The reply was that the only way they knew to account for it was that these counties were more adequately served with teachers of vocational agriculture.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. ARENTZ. I think the bill recognizes the necessity of keeping the boy on the farm. The boy will not stay on the farm unless he has some hope of financial success. You teach the boy the way to raise livestock so that he can turn out a beef in 9 or 10 months and get the highest price for it that is possible, how to feed the animal, how to raise all kinds of crops that can be raised in his section, and if he can be assured of financial success he is going to stay on the farm—if this bill can teach the boys and the girls of the farm that there is something else besides worry and work, dirt and deficit, and give them hope of having the kind of a home they envision through their vocational work, you are going to keep them on the farm.

Agriculture forms the very foundation of our country. The onward march of this wonderful country depends, my friends, upon the advancement, the success, the contentment of the farmers of America. This bill has this purpose in view. It furthers the benefits of the Smith-Hughes Act, which has from its passage performed a real help to agriculture through vocational training of the boys and girls of the farm. [Applause.]

Mr. BRIGHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. BRIGHAM. What provision is made for industrial training?

Mr. REED of New York. That work is going on now with a continuing appropriation.

Mr. BRIGHAM. What is the appropriation?

Mr. REED of New York. Three million dollars for trades and industry and $3,000,000 for agriculture.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Do all of the States avail themselves of this appropriation and use the full amount allocated?

Mr. REED of New York. Practically all of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. REED of New York. I yield myself three minutes more. Now, let me cover something here. You are all interested in the bill as well as your people back home, because this work has been going on in every community.

Now, this statement comes from a man whom you know:

It seems that after the agricultural vocational work had been in operation about five years a study was made to ascertain what became of the boys who had taken the vocational work. This survey of 8,000 boys that had taken one or more years of vocational agricultural instruction disclosed that 59 per cent of them were actually farming, 6 per cent were engaged in related occupations, 9 per cent in agricultural colleges, 15 per cent went to other colleges, and 11 per cent were in nonagricultural occupations.

Another survey has just been made covering the 5-year period ending in 1927. This 5-year record also shows 59 per cent actually engaged in farming, 9 per cent in related occupations, and only 2 per cent going to agricultural colleges.

A survey was made two years ago of the school system in New York State which included the persons who had attended the agricultural vocational course. This survey showed that 72 per cent of the boys who had been enrolled in courses of agriculture were either farming or attended a college of agriculture.

To show the growth of this work, when this law was passed there was a student body in vocational education of 25,000. The enrollment now is 1,000,000, showing an increase of 4,000 per cent in 11 years.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am a member of the gentleman's committee and favor this measure. I should like the gentleman to tell us, if he has not already done so, the organization that covers the country generally that made a study of this problem and that is urging the legislation.

Mr. REED of New York. The American Vocational Association, of course, has indorsed it in convention in every part of the land.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And the Department of Agriculture has strongly indorsed this bill.

Mr. REED of New York. Yes; and the head of the Department of Commerce, the head of the Department of Labor, and the Secretary of Agriculture. It has been indorsed by many farm organizations throughout the United States.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. And by those in charge of the public schools of the country?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes. It has a practically unanimous indorsement all along the line. I did not want to clutter up the RECORD with telegrams from industries and people in many lines of business activities.

Mr. PEERY. And no opposition has developed on the part of any of the States to this legislation?

Mr. REED of New York. Not at all.

Mr. PEERY. The department of instruction in Virginia is very much in favor of the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Taking all the gentleman has said for granted, can he advance any good reason why the States which seem to be so much interested in this legislation can not carry it on themselves, without coming to the Federal Government for aid?

Mr. REED of New York. The best answer to that is that the States are now putting up $2.65 for every dollar that they get from the Federal Government, and they apparently like this way of handling the matter.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am opposed to the principle of Federal aid. I feel that if the States can carry on an activity, then the States should carry it on and not come to the Federal Government for assistance.

Mr. LEAVITT. And is it not necessary in a movement of this kind of national value, where we desire it to be national in extent, that it have some national impetus behind it to start it and carry it on?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes; and that is what did start it, and that is what is carrying it along.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. REED of New York. At the suggestion of several gentlemen on the floor I ask unanimous consent to incorporate as a part of my remarks a list of the States and the number of schools receiving Federal aid for vocational education.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YON].

Mr. YON. Mr. Chairman, and ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I did not know that we would have this bill under consideration this morning. It is of very striking interest to me at this time. As my mail came in this morning I found a letter from a widow in my district who is trying to raise her boy and to get him into this demonstration work in agriculture. She is making a plea in respect to the necessity for raising money to finish his high schooling. It is very gratifying to come into the House at a time like this and observe the House considering a measure that will give to the youth of the rural sections of the country a greater opportunity to develop the natural resources of the rural sections and also build up a better citizenship, more intelligent, more enlightened, and which will provide a better opportunity than the farmers of our day and of days gone by ever enjoyed.

Of course we are all in favor of the bill. I had no idea of saying a word when I came into the Chamber, but my good friend, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] said that it seemed nobody wanted to talk on a subject like this, and it seemed such a good subject that I felt I should say a few words in its favor. There is nothing that I enjoy more in my legislative work and in working among the people back home than to work with the boys and girls of the 4-H Clubs. They are doing a great work and a good service, and I heartily indorse the appropriation of any amount of money that can be added to that already made available for this great purpose.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, the success of the Smith-Hughes Act has far exceeded the expectation of the Members of Congress at the time of its enactment in 1917. This success has been marvelous in one sense of the word. As was said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] this is farm-relief legislation in one sense of the word. I agree with him. The preparation and the effort given by means of this legislation to the young men and young women of the farms of the country are wonderful in their effect and influence on their future life. It prepares them for better methods of farming, causes them to take a renewed interest in agriculture, and causes them to remain upon the farms instead of going to the cities. It has created a sentiment in favor of real agricultural education. The sentiment created by means of this law is something like the sentiment in favor of better roads as a result of national aid to roads. National aid to roads and the coming of automobiles, trucks, and other motor vehicles have done more to create a better sentiment for good highways in the country than any other two things. I believe that the workings of this legislation are doing more to increase the sentiment in favor of real agricultural education than any other piece of legislation that has ever been enacted by Congress. The working of the law during the past 10 years shows there is a very great need and a real necessity for an increased appropriation in order to accomplish what was intended by the original act. That is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALMON. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman just stated the main purpose of the legislation is to increase the appropriation. Now, in the Smith-Hughes Act continuing appropriations were authorized, but, as I understand, no time limit on that authority is expressed in that act.

Mr. ALMON. That is true. There is no opposition to the bill. It comes with a favorable report from the Committee on Education, and I simply wanted to take this opportunity to say that I supported and voted for the Smith-Hughes law in 1917 and am heartily in favor of this bill and will vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MENGES].

Mr. MENGES. Mr. Chairman and Members of the committee, my motive in introducing this bill in the House was brought about because of the agricultural conditions which are discussed before the Committee on Agriculture every day. This is national legislation which I feel is required. I believe in a trained agriculture because of the absolute necessity for the farmer to be acquainted with changing conditions which are continually confronting him. Take for example the corn borer. We passed a bill here in the House not very long ago appropriating $10,000,000 for the purpose of eradicating the corn borer. Well, we can appropriate $100,000,000 and we will never eradicate the corn borer. The corn borer is here to stay. I say he is here to stay, and the man who will have to cope with the corn borer is the farmer. The Agricultural Department can give the farmer some instructions as to how to curb that curse, but so far as eradication is concerned that is out of the question. Now, I use this as an illustration as one insect that is going to invade the corn belt of the United States and remain there. Now what can be done? The thing to do is to establish agricultural operations of such a character that the corn borer can not thrive. That is the thing to do, and in order to do it we must be acquainted with the life history of the corn borer. In what stage of its development and when does it do the most damage? The department knows that the corn borer does the greatest amount of damage in the larval stage. The moth lays the egg on the cornstalk. A small larva hatches from the egg and proceeds to devour the cornstalk. It has spent the time of incubation on the cornstalk. In order to kill the larvæ and destroy the eggs we must plow under or burn up or cut into feed, such as silage, the cornstalk.

Now we must arrange our agricultural operations in such a way that we can take advantage of these processes to get rid of the corn borer. That is what will happen in the Corn Belt of the United States and the farmer, to inagurate these agricultural operations, must be trained. Take another insect. Over here in Pennsylvania where I come from we have an insect that is known as the angoumois moth. Its eggs are laid in the head of the wheat just as it is emerging from the stalk. The larva hatches from the egg and gets into the wheat grain and develops there, and if the grain is stored without putting a poison into it to kill the larva, by the time you have held the grain in the bin say, three, four, or six weeks, it will be absolutely worthless except for feed because the larva will hollow out the whole grain. Now we must curb the activities of that insect, the angoumois moth. What can we do? As soon as the wheat is dry enough after harvesting we thresh it and store it in bins and fumigate it with bisulphide of carbon and kill the moths.

Now there is another factor to be considered, and that is the economic side. I believe in a trained agriculture, and I am in favor of agricultural relief. I voted for it every time I got a chance. I think I am one of a few from the Eastern States who does that and who is not afraid to say so.

Mr. HUGHES. From what county in Pennsylvania are you from?

Mr. MENGES. York County.

Mr. HUGHES. Is that a farming county?

Mr. MENGES. It is one of the best and richest farming counties in the United States, and some of the best farmers that ever lived live there

Mr. HUGHES. And you are speaking from experience?

Mr. MENGES. Yes. I am a dirt farmer, and I know exactly what I am talking about.

Mr. LOWREY. Are your farmers in that splendid Pennsylvania county making any money now in farming, or are they falling short financially?

Mr. MENGES. They are falling short. I am one of them.

Mr. LOWREY. I wish you would bring that out.

Mr. MENGES. I will be glad to.

Mr. ALMON. Will you tell us something of the workings of the vocational schools in your part of the country under the Smith-Lever law?

Mr. MENGES. The work that is done in my section is among the best that we have. We have now in my section young fellows who started out farming and who had exhibits at the annual show at Harrisburg, and have taken the championship prize for corn production, quality and quantity, of the Eastern States.

Mr. ALMON. Men who have attended these vocational schools?

Mr. MENGES. Yes; men who have taken advantage of this training, although we did not have vocational schools when they went to school. But they have taken advantage of the training offered by our agricultural school at the State college.

Mr. HASTINGS. I understand the various amounts allocated to the various States are paid over to the States, and the State authorities themselves distribute them?

Mr. MENGES. Yes. That is right. That is my idea.

Mr. HASTINGS. It is entirely under State distribution?

Mr. MENGES. Yes. That was the idea that I had in mind when I introduced the bill. I want the National Government to help to pay for the education and training of farmers who have to deal with national questions.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then this bill does not change the method of distribution used heretofore?

Mr. MENGES. Not as I see it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, as a member of the Committee on Education which had before it for consideration this bill, introduced in the other body by the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia, and having heard the evidence submitted to that committee, which justified the legislation in the form in which it was reported from the committee, I am very earnestly in favor of the bill in that form and am not able to understand the advisability of the adoption of the amendments, the effect of which would be to reduce the appropriation authorized to a mere fraction of what it was in the form in which the bill passed the Senate and in which it was reported from the committee.

However, it is not that question that I desire to discuss before the Committee of the Whole. I am going to vote for the bill either with or without the amendments. I am going on the theory that half a loaf is better than no bread, although in this instance it is not even half a loaf.

But I want to direct your attention during the brief time I have allotted to me to an amendment which I intend to offer to this bill. I believe I have a proposition here which merits your consideration, and I ask for your attention while I undertake to explain it to you.

This bill provides as follows:

The appropriation made by this act shall be in addition to and shall be subject to the same conditions and limitations as the appropriation made by the act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education"—

And so forth. That is the Smith-Hughes Act. The Smith-Hughes Act made this provision:

That for every dollar of Federal money so expended the State or local community or board shall spend an equal amount for the maintenance of such training.

In other words, the method of distribution provided under the original Smith-Hughes law and under this bill is that the Federal appropriation shall be matched either by appropriations from the State or from the local community.

Now, my amendment is directed to the matching proposition. I am not opposed, of course, to the matching provision. I realize that is the basic principle of all legislation of this character, but I am opposed to the proposition that the matching may be done by local communities, and I will undertake to explain to you why that is true.

According to the twelfth annual report of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, which I hold in my hand, 35 of the 48 States of the Union failed to appropriate enough money during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, to match the Federal appropriation. We will take, for instance, the State of Georgia, my own State. The Federal appropriation was $194,569.14, the State appropriation was only $118,904.53, while local communities furnished $110,071.87.

Now what does that mean? It means that the Georgia State Board for Vocational Education, when the State failed to appropriate enough money to match the Federal fund, was reduced to the necessity of going to the communities of the State which were able to match the Federal fund and procuring from them funds with which the matching might be done. Thus the funds went to the more prosperous communities. In other words, they exemplified too literal an interpretation of the scriptural quotation:

To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away, even that which he hath.

Those districts of the State which were not financially able to contribute, where property values were low, where they were not able by local taxation to raise enough money for their educational purposes, and where therefore the need was the greatest—those districts were not able to obtain Federal aid for vocational education, but those districts of the State which were able financially to meet the Federal fund and to match it were given aid. I submit that is an unjust proposition, and I intend to substantiate what I have said concerning it by reading to you from the hearings before the Committee on Education. This is from the statement made by the Chief of the Agricultural Service, Federal Board for Vocational Education, and the Georgia director for vocational education, Mr. Chapman:

Doctor LANE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know whether my time could be spent more profitably by telling you more about what this work is than by you asking me questions. This chart you see on the wall here [indicating] is interesting because when the Smith-Hughes Act was passed in 1917 that chart was clean of red pins. Each red pin you see there represents a vocational agricultural department in a local high school.

Mr. TARVER. I notice in my own State of Georgia that in the northeastern section of the State there appear perhaps 100 pins around the locality of Athens, where the Georgia State Board for Vocational Training is located. The remainder of the State is very sparsely studded. In my own congressional district, which is in the northwestern corner of the State, I notice but one or two pins. May I inquire, Doctor, why so many vocational teachers should be located in the territory surrounding Athens and why there are so few scattered around over the remainder of the State?

Doctor LANE. I should like to call on Mr. Chapman, who is the director of the work in Georgia, to answer that question.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very glad to have an opportunity to explain why that condition exists. That is a further example of the authority that is vested in the local community in the development of this work. The Smith-Hughes Act, which was passed in 1917, stated that this money must be matched by State or by local funds. Until quite recently the State of Georgia did not match these funds from State appropriations, and in the development of this work we had to depend upon local communities quite largely to finance the work. The schools were selected on the basis of applications that came to the State board for vocational education through the local school officials, and we took care of those applications somewhat in the order in which they were received; and I would like to say that, unfortunately, I feel that this is a case, that very often this work was put in the communities that were best able to finance it rather than the communities that, perhaps, needed the work most.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chapman, at that point, if you will permit an interruption, would not that condition be obviated in the event this bill is passed and an amendment should be incorporated in the bill which would provide that instead of these Federal funds being matched by subdivisions of the State or by local school districts, or other subdivisions of the State, they should be matched by the State as a whole and the matter of the use of the funds of the State should be left entirely to the State boards for vocational education, so that they might use those funds in districts having the greatest need for this work, although those districts were not financially able to put up the funds to match the Federal funds?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Yes, sir; that could be done, and I might give you an example of the way this work has been administered in the State of Arkansas. Each State has its own plan for conducting this work, and each plan has its own basis of subsidizing or aiding the local communities where this work is carried on. In the State of Arkansas the State matched the entire agricultural fund that was provided under the Smith-Hughes Act, and they felt that since most of their communities in Arkansas were not able to finance the instruction themselves that it would be desirable for them to pay the entire salary of the agricultural teacher, and that is what they did; and the State board followed the same suggestion that was made by Judge TARVER in regard to the distribution of these schools. If we had decided, however, that that would have been the best thing to have done in Georgia, we would not have been able to do it, because the State until recently did not match any considerable portion of the Smith-Hughes fund.

Mr. TARVER. If, on the other hand, the State was not permitted to have subdivisions to match the fund, and the State found it necessary in order to get this money to match it themselves, don't you think the appropriation necessary would be easily obtained in Georgia?

Mr. CHAPMAN. I am confident it would be obtained without any difficulty.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If I understand the gentleman's position, if the local communities did not contribute and your State did not make any appropriation, you would not get a dollar of this fund.

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman does not understand my position, but if he will wait I think he will understand it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I thought I understood the gentleman.

Mr. TARVER. No; the gentleman does not as yet. I have not developed my proposal.

Now, it is interesting to note in this connection that upon that map, studded with red pins, indicating the location of agricultural instructors, aided by Federal appropriations, there were 308 pins in the State of Georgia and that only 2 of those were located in my own congressional district. There are 12 congressional districts in the State. The director of that State for vocational education attempted to explain it by saying they found it necessary to put the work in the communities that were able to meet the Federal funds rather than in those where

Federal aid was needed the most. That may be one reason, but it is not, I am sure, all of the reasons which exist for distributing the vocational instructors in that way. My district compares favorably in material welfare and prosperity with other districts of my State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. TARVER. I have not gotten down to the proposition I intended to submit to the House as yet, and that is this, that the bill be amended so as to provide that the Federal aid shall be matched by the State as a whole and to cut out the provision relating to matching by local communities. I am not asking that as to the existing law. Let the $6,000,000 you are paying out under the old law now go as it has been going, but so far as this small additional appropriation is concerned, of a half million dollars a year for five years and at the end of that time totaling $2,500,000, let it go to those districts of the country which stand greatest in need of help of this character. There is no question but that if you provided that it should be matched by the States it would be matched by the States. I am going to offer an amendment providing that the funds shall be matched by the States and shall be used by the State boards for vocational education in those districts of the States standing in greatest need of aid, whether they are able to match the funds or not.

Gentlemen, will you let some of this money go to those sections of our country where poverty is? Will you let some of it go to the places where the direst need exists for educational opportunities, or will you insist that it continue to go as it has been going in large part in every part of this country, to communities that already have the means to take care of their own educational problems? Remember that in the remote rural sections of the United States there are boys and girls to-day whose intelligence, whose character, and whose qualities of manhood and womanhood compare favorably with those located in any other part of this great country of ours. Are you going to carry the help of vocational education to them, or are you going to say that it all must go to those who already have that material prosperity by which they can provide their own educational opportunities?

If you provide that only communities able to match the Federal fund shall get help, that is the effect of it.

This condition as to Georgia is not local to that State. As I said in opening my remarks, it exists in 35 States of the Union, according to the report which I held in my hand a moment ago and which lies here. Thirty-five of the 48 States of the Union failed to appropriate enough money to meet the Federal appropriation and that deficit is supplied by the local communities. I gave Georgia as an example because I am familiar with conditions as they exist in that State and I like to try to talk about things when I do talk that I think I know something about.

When this bill is read under the 5-minute rule I intend to offer this amendment. In my judgment it is a just amendment. In my judgment it is an amendment which ought to appeal to the mind and to the heart of every man who wants to do justly by the population of the remote rural sections of this country, and I ask, gentlemen, that you give it conscientious, serious consideration.

Of course, I shall be satisfied with your judgment whatever it may be, but I hope it may be that the children of these sections which are not now having any educational opportunity along this line, and will not under the present system, may be afforded some small chance by the adoption of this amendment to the proposed legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND], trusting him as to how much time he will use.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to say in the first place that I do not understand in what manner the director of the vocational board could determine as to what sections of any particular State needs this money more than others. I do not care to take issue with Judge TARVER in regard to what he says about the people of his district, which is in the northwestern portion of the State, not having received and will not receive the benefit of this fund, but he must not forget that within 100 miles of Athens, where I live and where the director lives, there are poor people there who likewise need their portion of this appropriation. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that Athens is the seat of learning of the State of Georgia. [Applause.]

It has the oldest established-by-law university in the United States. The State normal school is located there. The State agricultural college is also located there, rated as about fifth among the best colleges of its character in the United States. Besides these three State institutions of learning the city of Athens has one of the best high schools in the State. There is an agricultural college at Monroe and an agricultural college at Madison, each within 20 miles of Athens, and both in my congressional district. I think that the fact that more boys and girls take advantage of this vocational fund in my district than in the district my friend Judge TARVER has the honor to represent is due not to any discrimination on the part of the director, Mr. Chapman, in the distribution of this fund, but partly to the fact that Athens is the center of learning of Georgia, but also to the further fact that the parents in the rural sections of my district and the boys and girls themselves first had knowledge and likely became more familiar with this vocational proposition than the people in the remote sections of the State. [Applause.]

The bill as originally introduced by Senator GEORGE and as it passed the Senate provided for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories and authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, the sum of $500,000 and for each year thereafter for 11 years a sum exceeding by $500,000 the sum appropriated for each preceding year. Annually thereafter there is a provision contained in the bill for a permanent authorization for an appropriation for each year the sum of $6,000,000.

My understanding is when President Coolidge received information of the passage of this bill he protested against the appropriation, or the authorization of an appropriation for the period of 11 years. Under the presidential duress put into motion, we were given to understand that the bill should be amended, reducing the period of the appropriations from 11 years to 4 years, otherwise the bill would not become a law.

The "economy" question of the White House becomes very material when the beneficiaries of an appropriation are residents south of the Mason and Dixon line.

In the absence of this protest on the part of the Chief Executive, I am satisfied that the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Education, Mr. REED of New York, one of the fairest and ablest Members of Congress, would have been perfectly willing for the 11-year appropriation to have remained in the bill.

The chief object of the bill, as shown by the bill itself and the report of the gentleman from New York, is to provide for the further development of the program of training farm boys and girls in agriculture and home economics in the several States.

All funds appropriated under the provisions of this bill are to be used solely for the purpose of extending the training prescribed in the Smith-Hughes Act which was passed by the Congress in February, 1917.

The Smith-Hughes Act, which was passed by the Congress 12 years ago, provides for the promotion of practical training as a part of the public-school program. It has for its main purpose the training of boys and girls to meet the real problems of life. It seeks to make our young people vocationally efficient. Under the stimulus given to practical training of boys and girls by this act, departments of vocational agriculture have been established in 3,590 schools in the rural sections of this country. Aid in maintaining departments of home economics has been extended to 1,973 schools.

The funds available under the provisions of the Smith-Hughes Act, which reached their maximum in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1926, have been sufficient to aid only 29 per cent of the rural high schools of the United States in maintaining vocational agriculture, and the meager funds provided for the aiding of home economics have been sufficient to place this type of training in only 8.7 per cent of the public high schools.

The Smith-Hughes Act provided, after 10 years of increasing appropriations, a maximum of $3,000,000 for vocational agriculture and $600,000 for home economics.

The bill under consideration is not legislation new or different in any way from that which is now in force. While it is important in the highest degree to the farmer boys and girls of the Nation, and while Senator GEORGE is entitled to full measure of credit for engineering it through the Senate, it simply authorizes appropriations of additional funds that will make it possible for additional rural districts to provide the practical type of training in their schools that is so essential to the welfare and prosperity of the country. The introduction of new and improved methods in farming, the increased use of machinery, together with the large scope of the farm business as it relates particularly to problems of marketing, distribution, consumption, and so forth, all point to the necessity of the coming generations being specifically trained to conduct successfully this ever-growing business.

Equally essential is training for the work of the farm home. Here, too, modern conveniences are contributing to improved methods in home making. Problems of selection, purchase, use, care, renovation, and maintenance of supplies and equipment to meet individual and family needs are sufficiently difficult to demand special training for their successful solution.

Provision in the public schools of the rural districts for training in home making is limited, and nowhere is such training more greatly needed. Not only do girls in these districts, as shown by statistics, marry younger than those in urban districts, but the farm home and the business of farming are so interrelated as to make success in the one dependent upon success in the other.

All boys who have taken advantage of the training under the Smith-Hughes Act, so far as it relates to agriculture, have carried out practical work on their home farms. It has meant an earning of $23,637,924.25 during the past five years. The Federal Government has put into this investment, through salaries of teachers of vocational agriculture, during the same period only $10,418,460. In other words, for every dollar of Federal funds spent in the enterprise there was a financial return of $2.26 realized by the vocational boys.

The program of vocational agriculture has been in operation long enough to show whether or not the boys who graduate or pursue agricultural courses for at least one year are remaining in agricultural work. A recent nation-wide study made by the Federal Board for Vocational Education shows that from 60 to 75 per cent of the students given vocational instruction are now in agricultural work.

The teachers of vocational agriculture are of necessity in the closest contact with farming and farm life in their respective communities. They know the needs, longings, and aspirations of the farming population. They constitute a most favorable agency for the dissemination and utilization of the researches and findings of the United States Department of Agriculture and the 48 land-grant colleges and experiment stations.

Wherever vocational departments in home making have been placed in the schools, active cooperation exists between school and home. The instruction in the school is closely related to the work of the homes from which the girls come, and fathers and mothers are among the most ardent supporters of the program.

It is estimated that approximately 80 per cent of girls and women in the country are at some time home makers, and that about 1,000,000 marry annually. If these statistics even approach to the real situation, it can be said that all girls trained in this field in the public schools will probably at some time enter upon the work of home making.

While it is not possible in home making as it is in agriculture to assign money values to the influence of this vocational training on the home, it is safe to predict from observation of the results of the work that its extension to larger numbers of girls and women in the country would contribute greatly to their success as home makers; and since national prosperity is dependent to so large an extent upon good homes, the benefits would extend to the improvement of standards of living in the Nation as a whole.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to say to the members of the committee I am earnestly in favor of this legislation and my reason is because I have observed some of the benefits that have been derived from such legislation.

In my own congressional district we have had some vocational training experience that has been of great benefit to the farmers of that locality. We have not only had this benefit among the farmers but we have it in the industrial manufacturing centers as well. We have benefited by this vocational training in the factories and as a concrete example, recently there was located in Huntington a pants and overall factory from Baltimore.

The girls, when they first went to work in this factory, would earn five or six dollars a week. After having the advantages of vocational training for the short time of two or three weeks, their wages were increased to fifteen or twenty dollars a week. This was the result of vocational training in a manufacturing plant of which I have personal knowledge.

Now, I am going to give you another example with reference to the farmers. We had in my congressional district a large farm that had been owned and operated by a certain farmer for a great many years. The farmer had not made a success of this farm. He had not kept up with the new ideas brought out by the Department of Agriculture and announced through the bulletins which they issue. If he had known about them he would have been more prosperous in his farming. He sold this farm to a man from Wisconsin. The man from Wisconsin and his boys had obtained a lot of information from vocational training and improved methods of farming. This Wisconsin man was farming this particular farm, not very far from where I live, and the man who formerly owned the farm went by and saw this man breaking up clods and he hollered over to him, "Brother, give 'em hell. I tried to make a living on that farm for 20 years, but if I wanted to make a living now I would go up to Huntington and get me a blind horse and a dray." This same farmer who came from Wisconsin and had the advanced ideas of farming raised on that farm 50 acres of tobacco which he sold to the American Tobacco Co. in the field for $225 an acre. He raised 125 acres of potatoes and sold 125 bushels to the acre to the Frick Co., of Pittsburgh.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Did the gentleman say that he sold 50 acres of tobacco for $2.25 an acre?

Mr. HUGHES. No; for $225 an acre. The other farmers of that locality who had not taken advantage of vocational training and had not taken advantage of the valuable bulletins issued by the Government, only raised about 60 to 75 bushels to the acre of potatoes, where this man, who had taken advantage of the vocational training, had raised 125 bushels to the acre.

These are actual results. I did not think it was necessary to take the time of the House to say anything in favor of the bill, but there are certain questions that have been brought out by different gentlemen, and I want to say that I indorse everything that the chairman of the Committee on Rules [Mr. SNELL] has said, and especially what he said with reference to the committee which came to Washington from their convention in Philadelphia last month:

> A committee of that organization from their convention in Philadelphia last month came to Washington, and I want to say they are a fine, representative lot of men. I have never met a committee of men who appealed to me as more interested in their work, had a greater desire to cooperate in every way with Congress, and only ask for the things they ought to ask for, than was this committee; and I was very much impressed with the personnel of the committee and the work they are doing. The country districts are especially interested in this vocational educational training, and let me say to the Members of the House that this, in my judgment, is a real farm-relief measure, if anything could be considered as such, because it helps to educate the young boys and girls in the country districts in the questions that arise in the management and conduct of the farm industry. For that reason I believe it is very important and should be considered. * * *

I also agree with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] has so well expressed in giving the House the benefit of the advantages of this bill in his report, which is as follows:

> [H. Rept. No. 1667, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]
> Mr. REED of New York, from the Committee on Education, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 1731):
> The Committee on Education, to which was referred the bill (S. 1731) to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States, having considered said bill, reports favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass. This bill passed the Senate April 9, 1928.
> S. 1731 is a bill to provide for the further development of the program of training of farm boys and girls in agriculture and home economics in the several States.
> All funds appropriated under the provisions of this bill are to be used solely for the purpose of extending the training prescribed in the Smith-Hughes Act which was passed by the Congress in February, 1917.

Under the stimulus given to practical training by this act, departments of vocational agriculture have been established in 3,590 schools in the rural sections of this country. Aid in maintaining departments of home economics has been extended to 1,973 schools. The character of work that has been conducted in these schools has so commended itself by its practical character that a very large number of additional rural districts are now demanding assistance in the establishment of these departments.
> The funds available under the provisions of the Smith-Hughes Act, which reached their maximum in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1926, have been sufficient to aid only 29 per cent of the rural high schools of the United States in maintaining vocational agriculture, and the meager funds provided for the aiding of home economics have been sufficient to place this type of training in only 8.7 per cent of the public high schools.
> The Smith-Hughes Act provided, after 10 years of increasing appropriations, a maximum of $3,000,000 for vocational agriculture and $600,000 for home economics.

The bill S. 1731 is not legislation new or different in any way from that which is now in force. It simply authorizes the appropriations of additional funds that will make it possible for additional rural districts to provide the practical type of training in their schools that is so essential to the welfare and prosperity of the country. Most of these farming districts are not in a financial condition to provide further for this type of training without State and Federal assistance. The introduction of new and improved methods in farming, the increased use of machinery, together with the large scope of the farm business as it relates particularly to problems of marketing, distribution, consumption, etc., all point to the necessity of the coming generations being specifically trained to conduct successfully this complex and ever-growing business.

Do the boys become farmers? A recent nation-wide study made by the Federal Board for Vocational Education shows that from 60 to 75 per cent of the students given vocational instruction are now in agricultural work.

It was very forcefully brought to the attention of the Committee on Education that there is an unusually widespread interest in this bill throughout the Nation. The bill has the indorsement of agricultural leaders, educators, the farm press, and the national farm organizations, as well as such women's clubs and organizations as the General Federation of Women's Clubs and the American Association of University Women. It is indorsed by the United States Department of Agriculture and the Federal Board for Vocational Education.

This bill does not initiate any new principle of Federal participation. It merely extends the benefits now enjoyed by many rural communities to other farm communities not now receiving such benefits.

I am in favor of the bill, and I certainly hope it will pass. I am in favor of the amendment adopted by the Senate, because I feel it is necessary. Otherwise it might endanger the passage of the bill, and I am sure that at the end of five years the Congress, after knowing the valuable results obtained from this legislation, will be glad and willing to extend the time. This will give to the youth of the rural sections of the country a great opportunity to develop the natural resources of the rural sections and build up a better citizenship in intelligence, in enlightenment, and will provide a better opportunity than the farmers of our day had, and it is to this class that we must look to do things in the future. In order for the farmer to make a success of farming, it is absolutely necessary that he keep up with the latest and most improved facilities. When he does this the farmer then has a hard time of it.

I feel that this bill will have a tendency to keep the boy on the farm, and that certainly will be a good thing for the boy and for the country as well.

Mr. TARVER, from Georgia, has certainly given some valuable information, and I am quoting this part of his remarks, and right here I want to insert the statement which was made by Doctor Lane to the committee at the hearings:

Every boy who elects to take the vocational work as part of his high-school education is required to carry on for at least six months at home some definite, practical work under the supervision of his teacher. Now, that means an economic return on the part of the boys in the production of livestock or crops or some other work around a farm.

The total labor income from this practical work during the past five years was $23,637,924.25. This is not an estimate. It is based upon accurate cost accounting. For every dollar of Federal funds spent for vocational agriculture there was a financial return of $2.25 realized by the boys from their labor. The total Federal fund spent for salaries of teachers of vocational agriculture during the 5-year period was $10,418,460, and there was realized $23,637,924.25 from the practical work the boys did.

[Applause.]

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am heartily in favor of the defeat of this bill. I spoke against the original bill in this House on May 19, 1924. I want to ask you to pause for a moment and consider our relations to legislation in this House. As all will admit, we have no power to pass any bill in this House where the power is not given by the Constitution directly, or by direct implication. I challenge any gentleman on the floor of this House to point out to me a provision of the Constitution that gives Congress the power to legislate on education. Where is it? Speak up. It can not be found. Not only is it not found there but it was in open convention offered to the convention and declined; and yet there are gentlemen who are attempting to hold that the so-called general welfare clause covers education, when those who made the Constitution had it specifically proposed to them by a committee of the convention and they declined to accept it. Is it not attenuated logic that can see in the words "to provide for the general welfare" a right to legislate on a subject which was proposed in the convention when the convention refused to put it in the Constitution among the grants of power?

On the 18th of August, 1787, during the progress of the convention, when they were considering the Pinckney plan, which contained no grants of power to Congress over education or agriculture, a committee of the body proposed forty-odd additional propositions to be added to the powers of Congress already contained in that plan. One of these provisions gave Congress the power to legislate on education. It read as follows:

To establish seminaries for the promotion of literature and the arts and sciences. (Journal of the Federal Convention, Boston, 1819, p. 260.)

Another was as follows:

To establish public institutions, rewards, immunities, for the promotion of agriculture, commerce, trades, and manufactures. (Id. p. 261.)

Another proposing a council of state for the President composed of the following officers:

1. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who shall, from time to time, recommend such alterations of, and additions to, the laws of the United States, as may in his opinion be necessary to the due administration of justice, and such as may promote useful learning and inculcate sound morality throughout the Union.

2. The secretary of domestic affairs, who shall be appointed by the President, and hold his office during pleasure. It shall be his duty to attend to matters of general police, the state of agriculture and manufactures, the opening of roads and navigation, and the facilitating communications through the United States.

There are other propositions looking in the same direction. Not one of the above ever appeared in the Constitution; but see how striking is this last proposition, section 2; for, among the duties assigned to the secretary of domestic affairs, the matters of roads and navigation and communications throughout the United States were incorporated in the Constitution, but the matters of "general police", the state of agriculture and manufactures embraced in the same section were never mentioned, while roads and navigation and commerce, put side by side with the matters of general police, agriculture, and manufactures, were inserted in the Constitution.

This is a powerful vindication of our position. These questions were submitted openly to the Convention with the appeal of a committee to add them to the congressional powers, and they were rejected and they were never heard of afterwards. Where do we get the power to-day to do this thing? Some gentleman says, "Well, we have always been doing it."

I do not recognize that argument. That is the bootlegger's argument. [Laughter and applause.]

A man that advances it may not be the bootlegger as we understand it, but he is using the bootlegger's argument. Where do you get the power? I am not asking you to take my view of it. I ask you to hear three of the greatest judges who ever sat on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the great case of Gibbons against Ogden (1. Wheat. 187), decided by Chief Justice Marshall, discussing the taxing power of the States and the taxing power of the Federal Government—for this was not obiter dictum—said:

> In imposing taxes for State purposes the States are not doing what Congress is empowered to do. Congress is not empowered to tax for those purposes which are within the exclusive power of the States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman thinks that the general welfare clause would not apply?

Mr. TUCKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin understand the general welfare clause to give Congress the right to legislate on any subject it deems proper?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. TUCKER. As I understand the question of my friend from Wisconsin he is running on the old exploded idea that that proposition means that Congress has the power to legislate on anything it may deem for the welfare of the people of the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman must not impute any opinion to me—I asked the gentleman a question.

Mr. TUCKER. I am trying to get the gentleman's opinion for this reason. Mr. Hamilton in June, 1787, introduced into the convention a proposition giving Congress the power to legislate on all subjects, State and national. It was given but scant consideration and that proposition was voted down directly or indirectly five times during the convention, and yet gentlemen come here and say a proposition which was voted down five times is still alive; that it has as many lives as a cat. Whatever may be the general welfare clause, if there is such, and I do not think there is such a clause, that is Judge Marshall's opinion, for he says that Congress has no power "to levy taxes for those purposes exclusively within the power of the States," and confessedly education is a State function.

I take you a little further. In 1842 in the great case of Dobbins v. The Commissioners of Erie County (16 Peters, 448) Judge Wayne delivered the unanimous opinion of the court, and in that court sat Chief Justice Taney and Judge Story agreeing with him. In that unanimous decision the court held, speaking of the taxing power:

> The revenue of the United States is intended by the Constitution to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; to be expended, in particular [that is, to be more particular] in carrying into effect the laws made to execute all the express powers "and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United."

In 1868 Chief Justice Chase rendered a decision in the case of Veazie Bank v. Fenno (8 Wall. 541), in which he said, speaking of the taxing power:

> There are, indeed, certain virtual limitations, arising from the principles of the Constitution itself. It will undoubtedly be an abuse of the power if so exercised as to impair the separate existence and independent self-government of the States, or if exercised for ends inconsistent with the limited grants of power in the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I rest my case right there. Here is Marshall, the Federalist, Taney, the Democrat, Chase, the Lincoln Republican, "a trinity in unity" agreeing on one thing, namely, that there is no power in Congress to lay a tax for any purpose that belongs exclusively to the States. On that granitic foundation I stand. If we can not follow that trio we had better surrender our charter and go out of business.

I hear a great deal about the constant violation of the Constitution and a certain law, known as the Volstead law. How do we answer charges like this? Have each of us our own "little pet" violations of the Constitution, possessing a far-off beneficent hue which we readily excuse, while deploring with pitiless tears those ruthless violators of other sections which we have no inclination to disregard? Are we following the doctrine of Hudibras who said:

> We compound for sins we are inclined to
> By damning those we have no mind to.

The breaking of the Constitution is just as fatal in the vocational educational bill as it is in the Volstead law. I am against all such legislation, such as child labor laws, educational laws and maternity laws, because they are unconstitutional, and if we Democrats ever expect to redeem the old Party, we must go back to the Constitution and stand by it steadfastly and firmly. [Applause.]

In extending my remarks by permission I beg to refer briefly to the constitutional argument submitted by my friend, the chairman of the committee, Mr. REED of New York.

In my remarks at the outset I challenged the production of a power in Congress under which this bill could pass. There was no response to that challenge, and I doubt not my friend felt that it was necessary at least to make a gesture on this subject, and he introduces the usual gesture, that the authority comes from the so-called general welfare clause, and he quotes Judge Story as indorsing that view. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 13, 1927, is recorded a speech I made entitled "Judge Story's Position on the General Welfare Clause," to which I ask the consideration of any who are interested in this subject. I merely quote below sections 909 and 910 of Judge Story's great work to show that Judge Story, from my examination of the matter and which is set forth in the above speech, in his commentaries took two inconsistent positions, which can not be reconciled, for sections 909 and 910 are certainly unanswerable. The sections are as follows:

> SEC. 909. The Constitution was from its very origin contemplated to be a frame of a national government of special and enumerated powers, and not general and unlimited powers. This is apparent, as will be presently seen, from the history of the proceedings of the Convention which framed it, and it has formed the admitted basis of all legislative and judicial reasoning upon it ever since it was put into operation by all who have been its open friends and advocates, as well as by all who have been its enemies and opponents. If the clause "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" is construed to be an independent and substantive grant of power, it not only renders wholly unimportant and unnecessary the subsequent enumeration of specific powers, but it plainly extends far beyond them and creates a general authority in Congress to pass all laws which they may deem for the common defense or general welfare. Under such circumstances the Constitution would practically create an unlimited national government. The enumerated powers would tend to embarassment and confusion, since they would only give rise to doubts as to the true extent of the general power or of the enumerated powers.
> SEC. 910. One of the most common maxims of interpretation is (as has been already stated), that, as an exception strengthens the force of a law in cases not excepted, so enumeration weakens it in cases not enumerated. But, how could it be applied with success to the interpretation of the Constitution of the United States if the enumerated powers were neither exceptions from, nor additions to, the general power to provide for the common defense and general welfare? To give the enumeration of the specific powers any sensible place or operation in the Constitution, it is indispensable to construe them, as not wholly and necessarily embraced in the general power. The common principles of interpretation would seem to instruct us that the different parts of the same instrument ought to be so expounded as to give meaning to every part which will bear it. Shall one part of the same sentence be excluded altogether from a share in the meaning; and shall the more doubtful and indefinite terms be retained in their full extent, and the clear and precise expressions be denied any signification? For what purpose could the enumeration of particular powers be inserted, if these and all others were meant to be included in the preceding general power? Nothing is more natural or common than first to use a general phrase, and then to qualify it by a recital of particulars. But the idea of an enumeration of particulars which neither explain nor qualify the general meaning, and can have no other effect than to confound and mislead, is an absurdity, which no one ought to charge on the enlightened authors of the Constitution. It would be to charge them either with premeditated folly or premeditated fraud.

The next reliance my friend offers is the report of Mr. Hamilton on manufactures in 1791, in which he states that—> there seems no reason to doubt that whatever concerns the general interests of learning, of agriculture, of manufactures, and of commerce are within the sphere of the national councils as far as regards an application of money.

I think to rely upon Mr. Hamilton in this matter is quite unfortunate; and I think I can show that Mr. Hamilton's testimony as above given is worth little or nothing.

First. Mr. Hamilton in the above expression states that "learning, agriculture, manufactures, and commerce are within the sphere of the national councils as far as regards an application of money"; that is, Congress can make appropriations for such. In the preceding part of this speech I have quoted the instances where propositions relating to learning, education, agriculture, etc., were submitted to the Constitutional Convention to be placed among the powers granted to Congress, but they were not adopted, while other powers suggested at the same time were adopted. Is not that sufficient to show that no such power exists?

Second. On the 4th of September the committee of 11 reported that clause 1 of section 1, Article VII of the Pinckney plan should read:

The legislature shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

This was adopted without a dissenting vote. The Pinckney plan, which had been adopted on the 16th of August, merely provided that "The legislature shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises"; followed by the other grants of power. The reasons for inserting these words "to pay the debts," and so forth, are given in my speech above referred to, which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on December 13, 1927, under the heading of "In Conclusion." Now the claim is made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], the chairman of the Committee on Education of this House, that these words constitute a substantive grant of power to Congress to pass all and any laws affecting the general welfare of the people of the United States; and while Judge Story, in a luminous argument, shows such a claim to be preposterous, he claims that, under these words, Congress may make appropriations for any object which in their judgment they may believe to be for the common defense or general welfare of the people of the United States—that is, that Congress can appropriate money to an institution that it is denied the power to create.

The question, therefore, is brought sharply to this issue: Did the men constituting this committee of 11 intend, by the insertion of these words, to destroy the Pinckney plan containing only specific grants of power to Congress, which had been passed unanimously by the convention without a single negative vote on the 16th of August previously? An examination of this committee will show that the majority of them could never have agreed to any such proposition. The known sentiments of at least seven of them, and probably nine, show conclusively that their insertion of these words was never considered by them as authorizing the construction put upon them by the Hamiltonians, or by the learned Judge Story.

Albert Gallatin, of Pennsylvania, was one of the most distinguished men of his day. On the 16th of June, 1798, as a Member of Congress, he made a speech on this clause, in which he said:

He (Gallatin) was well informed that these words had originally been inserted in the Constitution as a limitation to the power of laying taxes. After the limitation had been agreed to, and the Constitution was completed, a member of the convention (he was one of the members who represented the State of Pennsylvania), being one of a committee of revisal and arrangement, attempted to throw these words into a distinct paragraph, so as to create not a limitation, but a distinct power. The trick, however, was discovered by a member from Connecticut, now deceased, and the words restored as they now stand. So that Mr. Gallatin said, whether he referred to the Constitution itself, to the most able defenders of it, or to the State conventions, the only rational construction which could be given to that clause was that it was a limitation, and not an extension of powers. (U. S. Annals of Congress, 5th Cong., 1797–1799, vol. 8, p. 1796.)

For confirmation of the above see The Framing of the Constitution, Max Farrand, page 182.

It is of interest to note that Abraham Baldwin, a member of this committee, was a member of the Federal Convention and a Member of the same Congress (the Fifth) that Gallatin was, and engaged with him in this debate, and he doubtlessly heard Gallatin's statement, and there was no denial of it from him.

Who was the member from Pennsylvania in the convention who attempted this "trick"? It is easy to ascertain who he was. In being designated as one of a committee of revisal and arrangement in the convention we find that the member from Pennsylvania on that committee was Gouverneur Morris. And who was the member from Connecticut that discovered the "trick"? By the process of elimination this is easily discovered because Mr. Gallatin said "he is now dead." The Gallatin words were spoken in 1798. Johnson, Ellsworth, and Roger Sherman were the members of the convention from Connecticut. Johnson and Ellsworth died after 1800, and Roger Sherman died in 1793; and Roger Sherman, who detected this "trick," was a member of this committee of 11 that brought in this report, and, having prevented Morris from making the change by throwing these words into a distinct paragraph, it showed first that Sherman was opposed to the unlimited power attempted to be given to these words by Morris's "trick," and, second, that Morris was trying to make the change to carry out Hamilton's idea, because the clause as adopted September 4 was fatal to Hamilton's desire for unlimited powers.

This "trick" described by Mr. Gallatin as attempted by Gouverneur Morris arose out of the fact that on the 8th of September the convention appointed a committee "of five to revise the style and arrange the articles agreed to by the House." The committee was composed of Samuel Johnson, Hamilton, Gouverneur Morris, Madison, and King, and on the 12th of September that committee made its report and article 1, section 8, appears as follows:

SEC. 8. The Congress may, by joint ballot, appoint a treasurer. They shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises;

To pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;

To borrow money on the credit of the United States;

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes, etc. (Journal of Federal Convention, Boston, 1819.)

Had the Constitution been ratified in that form, there would be considerable ground for asserting that it contained the Hamiltonian idea of unlimited power, for here these words are taken from a dependent position in the first clause of section 8 as a part of it, and have no relation to the power of taxation as set forth in that clause, and are entirely divorced from this clause, and by their location are made an independent, separate clause, and become one of the substantive grants of power to Congress, just as the other 17 grants in this sentence.

This report made by the committee on style was made to the convention on September 12. The Constitution was voted on and adopted by the convention on the 15th of September, but between those two dates the Journal makes no further mention of it and there is no other reference to it in the Journal, but when the Constitution appeared as finally signed by the members this clause was unchanged and was in the exact form adopted by the convention on the 4th of September. The attempt to change it had failed. This committee on style in the dying hours of the convention that proposed this Hamiltonian power for Congress, which had been rejected four times before this by the convention, has un unknown genesis—unless it may be found in Roger Sherman's discovery—and its paternity is also unknown, for its proponent in the convention (September 8) is not given in the Journal, but only the featureless words "It was moved and seconded." Who was the mover of the resolution? And what was the necessity for the committee? Three of its members (Morris, Madison, and King) were all members of the committee of 11, one from each State, appointed August 31, that had large and complete powers to deal not only with what already had been acted upon but what might yet be considered by the convention. This much at least is known, that a majority of the five were Hamiltonians, and the failure of their report presented on the 12th of September on this section was the expiring gasp of centralized power in its failure to incorporate imperial power in the Constitution of the United States.

The constitution to-day as it came from the convention has this clause just as it was adopted on the 4th of September, 1787, in that convention. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] and those who follow him claim that in this form Congress is empowered to legislate for any purpose that they think is for the good of the people. I appeal from the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] to Mr. Hamilton. If that clause adopted on the 4th of September, 1787, contained the power claimed for it by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] to-day it was practically the proposed power supplied by Mr. Hamilton in his draft of a constitution, that Congress should—have power to pass all laws which they shall judge necessary to the common defense and general welfare of the Union.

Did Mr. Hamilton believe that the clause adopted September 4 contained this unlimited power introduced in the convention in June? His proposition had scarcely been discussed in the convention at all. The Pinckney plan of specific powers had held the center of the stage from the 6th of August. The Randolph and Patterson plans had been discarded. The Pinckney plan on this subject, brought into the convention on the 6th of August, was passed without a dissenting vote on the 16th of August. So that the convention, to carry out the theory of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], adopted the Pinckney plan on the 16th of August in direct opposition to Hamilton's plan; and then on the 4th of September, by the insertion of the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" in the first grant of power in this section reestablished the original Hamiltonian proposal of unlimited power to Congress; and then mirabile dictu placed it in the very bowels of a specific grant to Congress to lay taxes, between the grant and a limitation upon that grant, undoing all of the work that had been done in the adoption of the Pinckney plan without opposition, as well as violating every principle of grammatical construction.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] may think that; but did Mr. Hamilton? If so, why was it that on the 8th day of September, 1787, a new committee, a majority of whom were Hamiltonians, one of them Mr. Hamilton himself, another Gouverneur Morris, his right-hand man, was appointed on revision and style; and on the 12th of September brought in a report that changed this provision, disemboweling the expression "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," from the grant to lay taxes, and setting it apart, down below the power to levy taxes, separated from it by a semicolon and making it a distinct substantive grant. Why should Hamilton through Gouverneur Morris, resort to that method to obtain an end which the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] says had already been obtained on the 4th of September? Why was Gouverneur Morris induced to resort to what Mr. Gallatin called a "trick" to accomplish for Mr. Hamilton what the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] says they already had? Argument is useless.

The action of the convention in rejecting it was the final blow; and yet, in the quotation from Mr. Hamilton's report on manufactures, above cited, made within four years from the time of this action in the convention he asserts in that report that learning, education, commerce, etc., could be reached by appropriations by Congress which he and Gouverneur Morris felt was not the case when the convention adjourned with their failure to have their report adopted changing the form adopted September 4, 1787.

Third, I have said that the Hamilton plan, giving Congress unlimited power to legislate on any bill that seemed to it for the good of the people, had been voted down directly or indirectly five times during the convention. I give you, to show this, these propositions and citations from the Journal of the Federal Convention.

1. On the 17th of July a resolution by Mr. Sherman.

2. On the 16th of August, when the Pinckney plan was adopted, which contained only definite and specific powers for Congress, which being limited in number, was the exact counterpart of Hamilton's unlimited proposal.

3. On the 22d of August Robert Morris and Rutledge of South Carolina offered amendments to give Congress the power "to fulfill the engagements and discharge the debts of the United States." This was clearly in direct opposition to Hamilton's proposition, for what engagements had the United States? Chiefly the 18 specific grants found in the Pinckney plan, which had been adopted on August 16, six days before.

4. On the 25th of August Mr. Sherman's resolution plainly upholding Hamilton's plan was rejected; Connecticut alone voting yea.

5. Then on the 12th of September the committee which had been appointed on the 8th of September to revise and arrange the articles of the Constitution, consisting of Johnson, Hamilton, G. Morris, Madison, and King, reported to the convention a substitute for Article I, section 8, adopted on the 4th of September (which is the language of the present Constitution) the following:

ARTICLE I

SEC. 8. The Congress may, by joint ballot, appoint a Treasurer. They shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises;

To pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;

To regulate commerce;

To coin money.

And so forth, and so forth.

Had this proposition been adopted by the convention to take the place of the clause adopted September 4, which is now the present Constitution, my friend from New York would have something to base his claim of constitutionality upon for this bill. It not only was not adopted; it was never considered. The subject was never discussed in the convention after it was offered; and after these five rejections of Mr. Hamilton's proposal to give Congress unlimited power to appropriate money, by what authority can it be claimed that such a power exists in the Constitution?

Justice Brewer, in the case of Fairbanks v. United States (181 U. S. 1), where a construction of the Constitution was urged, which had been rejected in the convention framing the Constitution, said:

In other words, the purpose of the restriction is that exportation, all exportation, shall be free from national burden. This intent, although obvious from the language of the clause itself, is reinforced by the fact that in the constitutional convention Mr. Clymer moved to insert after the word "duty," the words "for the purpose of revenue," but the motion was voted down. So it is clear that the framers of the Constitution intended not merely that exports should not be made a source of revenue to the National Government, but that the National Government should put nothing in the way of burden upon such exports.

In the same great case the same great judge, in discussing what is called "the practical construction of the Constitution," arising from the fact that officers of the Government have construed the Constitution in one way, and Congress itself has passed a number of similar bills, uses this striking language:

We have no disposition to belittle the significance of this matter. It is always entitled to careful consideration and in doubtful cases will, as we have shown, often turn the scale; but when the meaning and scope of a constitutional provision are clear, it can not be overthrown by legislative action, although several times repeated and never before challenged.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION.]

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have listened with great interest to the most eloquent appeal from our distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] asserting that this measure is unconstitutional. In the few minutes I have at my disposal I shall not attempt to enter at length into a discussion of the constitutionality of this question. In fact, my friend from Virginia is always so delightful in his opposition to these great programs of progress, that it requires some effort to oppose him. The gentleman harks back to the days before 1861. All well and good. But this great country has moved up and has taken some great strides in the way of progress since those days, however glorious they may have been. Washington and Madison urged the Congress of the United States to appropriate money to advance the cause of education in this country. Congress years and years ago provided the land-grant funds with which to establish agricultural and mechanical colleges in every State in the Union, and they have been established. Congress created a Bureau of Education and has been providing funds for its support through all the years. Congress created the Department of Agriculture that reaches out and looks after the pigs, cattle, and sheep, the Johnson grass and the barberry bush and the boll weevil and the corn borer and many other things, and Congress has been providing funds for these activities for a half century. My distinguished friend has been living in this country all of that time and has held membership in this House for many years, and I am wondering why he does not go into the Federal courts and have the acts declared invalid, instead of permitting Congress to continue throughout all the years to violate the Constitution, as he says. If we can reach out and look after the moose in Alaska and the sheep and the hogs and the Johnson grass and the boll weevil and the corn borer, it seems to me that we have a right under the Constitution to reach out under the "general welfare" clause and do something for the boys and girls of the Nation. [Applause.]

That is what we are undertaking to do in this bill. The gentleman from Virginia urges help for agriculture. In the many years of his fine service in this House I am satisfied that he has been voting for appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for bills that provide for the Bureau of Education. If this vocational education is not authorized by the Constitution, neither is either one of those activities of the Government authorized by the Constitution.

I strongly favor this particular legislation. I want to do something for agriculture. Here we propose to go out into the rural communities and not only train the minds but train the hands of the boys and girls of America. We are trying here to reach down from the top and help agriculture, and, in my humble opinion, we are going to help agriculture more when we get down with the boys and girls and train them properly than we can in any other way, because you will then enable them to solve these problems in a way that we may never be able to solve them ourselves.

Why, I can remember well when I was a lad out on a farm we did not know what caused chickens to have "limber neck." We did not know what to do for it. We were giving them this thing and that thing. The cause was a simple thing. It was caused by the fowls eating decayed flesh. All that was necessary was to keep decayed flesh away from the chickens and there was no more limber neck. This legislation has been especially attractive to the people of my State. I have had opportunity to observe its workings and you should see the interest that has developed on the farm, in the schools, in the homes, and everywhere. It seems to me we have been trying to make lawyers and doctors and teachers and preachers out of too many people who are not interested and have neglected to train these young folks who desire to follow vocational pursuits. We must give the boys and girls on the farm and in the homes in the rural sections a chance.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. COLLINS. We are spending millions of dollars a year in training boys and girls in the schools of the country in a military way. I have not heard any objection to that. What is the difference in the two?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, I think it quite as essential to the national defense and to the general welfare of this country to train our boys and girls in agriculture and home economics as to train them for war. We need more good farmers and good home builders.

I wish to say to my distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] that our forefathers in writing the Constitution, after they had named 14 activities in which the Federal Government should participate as proper activities on the part of the Federal Government, concluded with the statement "and to provide for the general welfare." This certainly did not refer to providing for courts, for armies, for navies, and the like. They had already declared those things in specific terms; but in their wisdom they must have realized that this country was young and in the years to come would develop along many lines. They provided for a covering clause "the general welfare," so that as new conditions should arise or activities that were not considered by them that the American people deemed for the general welfare Congress should have the power to make suitable provision, and under this general-welfare clause we have created the Department of Agriculture, other departments, and the Bureau of Education. As I recall, our Government started with but three departments. Now we have 10.

This bill, providing for vocational training of our boys and girls in the rural sections, on the farms, and in the homes, has just as much sanction of the Constitution as has the Department of Agriculture or the Bureau of Education.

We reach out and look after the moose in Alaska; we provide for the education of the Indians; we give the most careful attention to crops and to animals on the farm. We have been doing these things for years. Why should we now hesitate to provide suitable training for the boys and girls in the rural sections and make the farm and the home more attractive and give to these boys and girls the opportunities that boys and girls have in the cities, so that they may be more on an equality with the boys and girls in the cities and be able to meet the problems of life?

The money provided by the Federal Government for vocational education in Kentucky has been under a most capable man, Mr. Ivan Barnes, and his administration has been most successful and the results all that could be desired.

In looking after the boys and girls of the Nation I think we are undoubtedly providing for the general welfare of our country. If you want to help agriculture and the farmers of this country, vote for this measure and help the boys and girls on the farms. [Applause.]

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MCSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I expect to support the bill, but, apprehending that approval of the bill might be construed as an indorsement of the constitutional argument upon which it is based by the gentleman who just addressed the House, the gentleman from Kentucky, I have craved the privilege of a few minutes to explain my views in reference to the constitutional feature of just such a proposition, and it is this: I deny that the "general-welfare" clause as referred to here confers any specific power. The general-welfare clause was a résumé by way of brief reference to all the preceding 18 powers that had been specifically enumerated. So that it means this: That the Congress is authorized to levy taxes and to exercise the specific powers theretofore enumerated, so that by the exercise of those powers it may promote the "general welfare." But I am going to vote for the bill. How am I to be consistent? I sat as a student at the feet of Gamaliel, a great constitutional lawyer, such as the distinguished learned gentleman from Virginia is, and when this Smith-Hughes Act was first enacted I, as a private citizen and practitioner, had my "constitutional morality" terribly shocked, and I came to the House with considerable misgivings about what would be my attitude when after having stood here with elevated hand and had sworn to defend the Constitution of the United States, whether or not I could support such legislation as this.

But I confess, as many other Members have confessed in my hearing, that a term or two of service here is quite a liberal education. Our ideas become very materially liberalized, and I confess now that I can see the light in a way that I did not quite see it when I confined my vision strictly to the text of the decisions by Marshall and Taney and Cooley and other great constitutional lights.

Now, here is a proposition that seems to my mind to be as simple as it can be. It is true the Federal Government is based upon a Constitution of limited powers. By that it means "limited in number," and not limited in extent of the few powers that are given. Because every power given to the Federal Government is in itself absolutely unlimited. It is a whole, complete power of Government to the extent to which such governmental powers are conferred.

Now, the first essential, indispensable power of any government, as every one of these great judges has held from first to last, is this, the power of self-preservation, the power of self-maintained security; and I submit that the life, the firmness, the stability, and the perpetuity of this Government rests upon the farms and the homes of the Nation. [Applause.] And since this bill proposes to encourage farm information and farm interests and farm skill and knowledge of the home, and how to conduct and carry on the home work wisely, so as to promote health and happiness in the home, it is thereby promoting the security, the life, the integrity, the fundamental essence of the very Nation itself. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SPROUL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am for this legislation because by means of it the farm boys and girls throughout the land will have opportunity to acquire a knowledge of agricultural economics and administration. In other words, they will acquire the knowledge of how to make the farm pay.

There is a conspicuous lack among the farming communities of the land of this particular character of education. Of course we might say that there are other lines of industry where there is also a lack of economic and business knowledge concerning the industry in which people are engaged. The banking business might be mentioned as one of those in this particular class of education. The young men and the young women should be taught economics as well as how to cultivate and how to produce certain crops. The unwisdom of spending much time and much effort and much money on nonproductive lines certainly should be taught to the young men and young women contemplated by the provisions of this bill.

In our great agricultural State much effort is being made by the director of vocational education in extending this character of education to every part of the State. And now I wish to quote, if I may, what our director has to say on this particular subject. He says:

> We are asking this legislation because we have reached the limit of expansion of our program in our State. We are reaching 100 rural high schools out of a possible 400, and we are reaching 2,000 boys out of a possible 8,000 boys. I am talking of farm boys. We are seeking this education in order to extend this training to communities in Kansas to which it has not been extended.
> C. M. MILLER,
> State Director of Vocational Education, Topeka, Kans.

I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it shall not be my purpose of indulge in any discussion of the constitutionality of this measure, as requested by the gentleman from New Jersey. I am glad we shall have the support of the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN]. I am glad of the conclusion he has reached, but I am not so profoundly impressed with the reasoning by which he arrives at his conclusion. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] paid a splendid compliment to those who have so zealously pressed this legislation. He stated that they had presented the merits of this bill before the Committee on Rules very creditably.

I wish to say that the department of education of the great State of Ohio deserves a lot of credit for assisting in laying the groundwork of that splendid sentiment. The State of Ohio is entitled to compliments for its part in the furtherance of this measure, and these distinguished schoolmen who have been so forward in that work are to be complimented. I have said what I rose to say, and will yield the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman and colleagues, I do not desire to go into the constitutionality of the bill. I do not think it is necessary. I would like to remind my colleagues of the fact that the State which I, in part, represent appropriates for the control of floods and to reclaim lands, and those appropriations will, we hope, be met by the Federal Government funds. I likewise believe it is the duty of the Federal Government to foster education for the rural districts. If you will show me rural districts of any State where you have an educated people, I will show you a people who are preserving their social institutions. If you will show me an enlightened citizenship, I will show you that its education leads it forward in every other way. I do not believe that education and wisdom increases misery but believe that it dispels misery. I believe in light and education. When education is fostered, you foster the wealth and the ability of the people; it goes to make usefulness and happiness. I am glad that the Committee on Rules saw fit to bring in a rule for the passage of this additional appropriation.

I would be glad if the Committee on Education would bring out a bill providing for a department of public education, with a secretary in the President's Cabinet. I have introduced such a bill, and I trust that it or some similar bill may be brought from the Committee on Education giving governmental approval of public education in the United States.

My friends, the subject of education is one in which we should all be interested. It is one of importance to the rank and file. The rural communities of our Nation are those which in the past have been neglected as far as vocational education is concerned, but now they are becoming enlightened. Good roads go all through them; power lines have been carried through them; telephone lines have been built through the rural communities, and now if you carry to them the educational opportunities that have heretofore been given to the cities and large centers of population you are going to see a great, safe, and powerful people rise and carry on their share of our Government's burden. I say, give to the youth of our land equal educational opportunities, regardless of whether he lives in country or city. [Applause.]

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I have no other speakers, but I believe I have a little time remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has 19 minutes remaining.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself as much of that time as I may desire to use. [Applause.]

A southern negro said, "You know, Massa Jim, he said sandy land makes the best 'tatoes and I say so, too, and we just argufied about it all day." Well, it seems we are "argufying" here for two hours on something about which we are all agreed, with one very honorable exception. I respect his scruples, but do not agree entirely with his conclusions.

On the general subject of vocational education I want to read a brief passage from a speech delivered by Edward T. Franks, vice chairman of the Federal Board for Vocational Education. This vocational education experiment has been tried out, perhaps, more thoroughly in our cities and larger towns and in industrial and manufacturing centers that it has been tried out in agricultural centers. I think the agricultural districts would have been better off had we had more of it and had it come into effect at an earlier date. Mr. Franks says:

> The vocational students in the Central Vocational School of Milwaukee, Wis., earn more money each year while attending school than the entire educational system costs the city of Milwaukee for all kinds of education.

That is a most startling statement. Furthermore:

> There were 63,600 part-time vocational students in the city of New York, and they earned annually while attending school $45,000,000.

Which is something over $700 per student, if I have calculated correctly in a hasty calculation.

> In 1926 the vocational educational students in agriculture alone in the State of Michigan earned more money while attending school than was expended in that State for all kinds of vocational education by Federal, State, and local communities.

Those are the results which have come from vocational education, mostly in the centers of industry. Now we come to a southern agricultural State:

> In the State of Arkansas the trained vocational students produced 230 per cent more cotton per acre than did the farmers of the State. In the State of Georgia the trained vocational students produced more than 100 per cent more cotton per acre than the average yield.

The experiment of vocational education has already been tried and has been found a success. It has been tried most thoroughly, and its results have been most felt in the towns and centers of manufacturing; but I believe the consensus of opinion in this Congress and in the Nation just now is that our greatest need is for a rehabilitation in some way of agriculture. The cry comes everywhere that agriculture is failing; that agriculture is in distress; that agriculture is not paying its actual expenses; and that the rural people are the people who are suffering just now financially, while the rest of the country and almost every other branch of activity is prosperous. I have heard it stated that within from 15 to 20 years our agricultural population would entirely change; that from one-fifteenth to one-twentieth of the whole agricultural population were leaving the farms every year and going to the towns and to the manufacturing centers. Therefore in from 15 to 20 years our agricultural population will change absolutely. Now, it seems to me we can not possibly find a more effective way of doing something worth while for agriculture than to replace that shifting population by a permanent agriculturally trained population; replace it by people who have grown up on the farm, and as they have grown up to manhood and womanhood there they have learned to love the farm and have acquired skill and progressiveness in the matters of farm life.

As I have observed in my own State, as I have gotten information on the Committee on Education, and as I have studied it everywhere, it seems to me the Smith-Hughes work is really doing more as an agricultural relief proposition; it is doing more to really reestablish agriculture, and will in the end mean more as a real agricultural program than any other legislation that has been proposed.

Along with our need of the rehabilitation of agriculture is our need of a permanent and progressive rural population. We have quoted until it has grown old:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates and men decay.
> Princes and lords may flourish or may fade,
> A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroyed, can never be supplied.

We do not like to say "peasantry," but, rather, a bold, rural population; and we do more for the safety of this country when we are working to a real development of high-grade, happy, satisfied, prosperous rural population—we are doing more for the defense of the country, I will say, than when we are building cruisers and enlarging armament. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, having observed the operation of this law during the past 12 years at rather close range and having given it considerable study, I am very pleased to have the opportunity of supporting additional legislation along this line.

I shall vote for the bill because I believe it will assist in educating the boys and girls of the country, and not only educating them but educating them for some specific vocation. They will be better prepared to do their work in rural life than they would be without this legislation. Any help, any encouragement, that we can give to these young Americans should be given. This recognition by the Federal Government will serve as a further stimulus in their efforts to develop the country districts and to make life there more worth the living. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee; in the wide range which the discussion of this very important legislation has covered this afternoon, there is one thought which I have not heard advanced. I refer to the relief that will be given to the people throughout the United States, particularly in rural sections, by way of lessening the burden of local taxation. Everyone familiar with the tax situation in the country generally knows that to-day the people in the rural sections are bearing relatively a very heavy burden of the taxes. School and road taxes make up the larger part of this burden. Practically every discussion on farm relief to which I have listened and every speaker who has given any thought to this fascinating theme agree that in the degree we can lessen the burden of local taxation for the support of the necessary institutional life in the country we will make one of the very best contributions toward substantial and permanent farm relief.

It is unnecessary to undertake to add anything to the discussion by way of emphasizing the importance of education for the boys and girls of the open country and particularly that form of education which emphasizes the vocational side. There are thousands of boys and girls who will never be able to take advantage of a college course and yet desire to prepare themselves in every way to be successful farmers and home makers. This bill will make available additional funds to enable the States to extend this form of education much more widely in the rural sections of the country and at the same time relieve the local community where such vocational high schools are established of bearing the whole burden of taxation. Because of the fact that the bill under consideration this afternoon enlarges the opportunities for high school vocational education in all sections of the country and at the same time relieves the local community of bearing the whole burden of operation, I am most heartily in favor of it and I desire to congratulate the committee upon having advanced consideration of the bill to the point of passing it.

When this measure is taken into consideration in connection with the increased appropriation made by the first session of the Seventieth Congress for the encouragement of boys and girls' club work throughout the country, I feel certain that rural life generally, and particularly the boys and girls in the open country are provided the greatest possible encouragement toward securing the training that will better fit them to carry on efficiently in two great fundamental callings of life in the United States, namely, agriculture and home making.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the constitutionality of this bill has been questioned, and I wish to answer that. My time is about up and I shall therefore ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. I want to touch for a moment on the constitutional question. That point has been raised here, and I want to answer it. From remarks made on the floor today you would think that the Federal Government had no authority and no right to make appropriations to help the cause of education. The authority for these appropriations is to be found in section 8, Article I of the Federal Constitution, which reads as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

This clause has given rise to much controversy, but the interpretation given to it by Story in his great work on the Constitution has been followed by Congress in practice since the Government went into operation. As Story observes, the clause should be read as follows:

> Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, the common defense and general welfare and the payment of the public debts being the ends for which the power is conferred, and taxation a means for their attainment.

This is the interpretation placed on this clause by Hamilton in 1791, in his report On Manufactures, who stated it as his clear opinion that the phrase "general welfare"— > is as comprehensive as any that could have been used—

> there seems no reason to doubt that whatever concerns the general interests of learning, of agriculture, of manufactures, and of commerce, are within the sphere of the national councils as far as regards an application of money, the only qualification of the generality of the phrase in question which seems to be admissible is this: That the object to which an appropriation of money is to be made must be general and not local, its operation extending in fact, or by possibility, throughout the Union and not being confined to any particular spot.

President Monroe in an elaborate and cogent paper entitled "Views of the President of the United States on the Subject of Material Improvements," submitted with his veto in 1822 of the Cumberland Road bill, took the same view. His attitude is expressed in the following sentence:

> My idea is that Congress have an unlimited power to raise money, and that in its appropriation they have a discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to the purposes of common defense and of general, not local, national, not State, benefit.

Since the Civil War there has been no President who denied the right of Congress to raise and appropriate money for purposes of general welfare because such purposes were not within the fields in which Congress is, by other provisions of the Constitution, empowered to legislate.

The appropriations made annually since 1862 for the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Labor, the Bureau of Mines, and the Bureau of Fisheries can find no justification except under a power to raise and spend money for "the general welfare."

It will be noted, too, that by the Adams Act, the Smith-Lever Act, the Smith-Hughes Act, Congress has made appropriations of large sums of money raised by general taxation for the advancement of education throughout the country.

The same is true of appropriations for the relief of sufferers from disaster in this country, of appropriations for polar expeditions, and for the observations of eclipses of the sun, and for participation in expositions. The relief for sufferers abroad goes even further, as, for example, the appropriation of $20,000,000 for grain for Russia.

In commenting upon Article I, section 8, to which reference has been made, John Norton Pomeroy, in his work on Constitutional Law, section 275, makes this observation:

> What measures, what expenditures, will promote the common defense or general welfare Congress can alone decide, and its decision is final. It is certainly not necessary that any particular expenditure should be spread over the whole country to bring it within the meaning of a defense which shall be common, or a welfare which shall be general. * * * Congress expends vast sums of money in the erection and adornment of a Capitol, in furnishing a library, in the purchase of pictures, statues, and busts, in endowing a scientific institution; but it is not claimed that these disbursements are not made for the general welfare. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of providing for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, the sum of $500,000, and for each year thereafter, for 11 years a sum exceeding by $500,000 the sum appropriated for each preceding year, and annually thereafter there is permanently authorized to be appropriated for each year the sum of $6,000,000. One-half of such sums shall be allotted to the States and Territories in the proportion that their farm population bears to the total farm population of the United States, exclusive of the insular possessions, according to the United States census last preceding the end of the fiscal year in which any such allotment is to be made, and shall be used for the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects in such States and Territories. The remaining half of such sums shall be allotted to the States and Territories in the proportion that their rural population bears to the total rural population of the United States, exclusive of the insular possessions, according to the United States census last preceding the end of the fiscal year in which any such allotment is to be made, and shall be used for the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors, development and improvement of home economics subjects in such States and Territories.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REED of New York: Page 1, line 6, after the words "June 30," strike out "1929" and insert in lieu thereof "1930."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REED of New York: Page, 1, line 7, after the word "for," strike out the word "eleven" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "year," insert a period and strike out all of line 9 and line 10 down to and including "$6,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 18, page 3, strike out the period and insert a semicolon, and add the following words: "and except that for each dollar of Federal money expended the State shall expend an equal amount for the maintenance of such training, and distribution of teachers of agricultural and home economics subjects shall be had in accordance with the need existing in various localities of the State, and without depriving communities unable to contribute to the expenditure for such purposes, or benefits of such act on account of such failure to contribute."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment to which I addressed myself in general debate. It proposes to change the method of matching only, so as to require matching by the State as a whole, instead of matching by the State or locality or local community. I explained a while ago what to me seemed the evils of the present practice. This does not affect the $6,000,000 paid out annually under the present law. It has reference only to how the matching will be done under this bill. The average amount appropriated to each State for the first year would be $10,000. I want to provide, and do provide, that that paltry additional appropriation may be spent by the State board for vocational education according to the needs of the various communities of the State, and without regard to their ability or not to match the Federal fund.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. As far as the first part of the gentleman's amendment is concerned, I do not know that I have any objection, but it seems to me that the last three or four lines of the amendment goes farther than the gentleman really wants to, as it changes the discretionary power which at the present time is lodged in the vocational board of each State. I am not certain but what that would mix up the whole proposition.

Mr. TARVER. I had no purpose of bringing that result about. The latter part of my amendment was added in explanation of the first part. As far as I am concerned I have no objection to modifying the amendment so as to provide only that the appropriations shall be matched by the State.

Mr. SNELL. As I understood the gentleman to say when he conversed with me was that he wanted the funds matched by the State as a whole and not by local communities

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. SNELL. And I think he would accomplish that result by striking out the last part of his amendment.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by eliminating all of the amendment after the words "such training" in line 3 of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Georgia will be allowed to modify his amendment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, may we have the modified amendment read as it now stands?

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment: At the end of line 18 strike out the period, page 3, and insert a semicolon, and add the following words: "and except that for each dollar of Federal money expended the State shall expend an equal amount for the maintenance of such training"——

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, if my time has expired, to proceed for an additional five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does not the gentleman understand that everything in his amendment is provided for under existing law?

Mr. TARVER. I do not.

Mr. WRIGHT. Suppose the gentleman's amendment is adopted and some State fails to match the Federal fund? Would not the opportunity be lost?

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman will remember that in the legislation under which Federal aid is furnished roads the allocation is made on the condition that the amount is matched by the State. That is just the condition I want provided in this bill. I want the matching done by the State, not local communities, so the poorer communities can get some of it. I have not been advised of any State failing to match the Federal appropriation as far as roads are concerned. I called attention a while ago to the fact that the average amount for each State for the first year is only $10,000 under this bill. There is now being paid out $6,000,000 each year, and should not we be willing to let this additional $10,000—the average that will go to each State for the first year—be placed where the need is the greatest in the discretion of the various State boards for vocational education?

Mr. WRIGHT. I am trying to get the effect of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. TARVER. I think I got the effect of the gentleman's question.

Mr. WRIGHT. If the State does not match this allocated amount as a State, does not the State lose the amount allocated to it out of the Federal funds?

Mr. TARVER. Certainly; but there is no question but that the gentleman's State and mine will match the small amount provided by the Federal Government under this bill. The only reason States do not do that now is because they realize the local communities will do it, and when they do then necessarily the Federal aid goes to those communities able to do that, and those who are not able to do it and who really need the help the worst get nothing.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is not that a matter that the States ought to settle among themselves, and do not the States know better the needs of the several communities than we in Washington can possibly know?

Mr. TARVER. I do not think we ought to extend to the States an invitation not to match the Federal fund by providing that it may be matched by these various communities, and, therefore, an invitation to follow the practice which has been followed with such disastrous results so far as the needy portions of the States are concerned.

Mr. TILSON. It occurs to me that we are going far enough in matching dollars with the States without going still further and matching with the communities. It seems to me that the States ought to arrange that matter themselves.

Mr. TARVER. That is the position that I take, that the matching ought to be done by the States, and that the local communities should be left out of it. Then the poorer communities could get some of the money.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let us get this matter cleared up. From the question asked by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], the inference might be left in the minds of some that under existing law local communities can not match the Federal Government. As I understand the existing law, not only the States may do it but the local communities in the absence of the State may meet that obligation and can match the Federal fund and get the benefit of the Federal appropriation.

Mr. TARVER. By reason of the conditions I tried to point out to the House, the communities able to do the matching get all the money. I want to provide what the gentleman from Connecticut suggested, that the matching be done by the States, and that the law leave the local communities out of it entirely, and then let the State boards exercise their discretion as to where the money should go.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under existing law the Federal national board can not deal directly with the local communities in allocating this fund. They have to deal through the States' educational authorities.

Mr. TARVER. They deal through the State boards for vocational education.

Mr. DENISON. Is not the fundamental principle of the whole legislation to try to induce the States as States to go into this vocational education?

Mr. TARVER. Yes; and especially to help the helpless and not those who do not need help.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] was considered by the committee very carefully. It is not the purpose of this legislation to step in and try to dictate to the States what ought to be done in the matter, and I think this amendment ought to be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TARVER) there were—ayes 10, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee will now rise and report the bill back to the House.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MAPES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 1731) to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories, and reported the same back to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered on the amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. REED of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FEBRUARY 22, 1929

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on February 22, 1929, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] may have one hour in which to address the House on the life and character of George Washington.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that on February 22, 1929, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] may proceed for one hour on the subject of George Washington. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to object, but I rise to ask whether it is the purpose to follow the usual program on that day and have Washington's Farewell Address read to the House?

Mr. SNELL. I do not know that there has been any program suggested, but there is nothing to interfere with having that done later, if the Members of the House desire it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—VOCATIONAL TRAINING

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House have three legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HALL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ardently favor the passage of S. 1731 as an aid to vocational training. Looking back over the past fifty-odd years I can not but be impressed with the importance, the dignity, and sterling worth of a measure whose purpose it is to give to the youth of our Nation the advantages of the trained hand as well as the trained mind. At no time in the history of the world was there greater call for the people of the world to have a revival of devotion to duty through efficient and painstaking toil.

Work is not a curse, as some seem to think. It is God's medium of happiness. To have a job, to do that job well, is the secret of success and happiness; and it does not make much difference what the job is. The founders of the Republic were the hardest working people of history. They thus created within a century a nation which leads the world in government, science, art, mechanics, and production for human needs. Their life and example proves the theory that genius is as closely allied to perspiration as to inspiration.

The added charm that American ideals have given to human industry is illustrated in the progress of the Nation as the founders of the Republic toiled to clear the forests and to build homes and schools and churches and factories; and as they toiled they prayed, and thus laid wide and deep the foundations of a model human government. They applied their skill of mind and heart and brain to the invention and building of machines, to the harnessing of the forces of nature for use in the service of mankind, making it easier to acquire the necessities and more possible to enjoy the luxuries of life than has ever before been known in any land in any age.

It is a serious duty that now devolves upon the present generation following such a noble history of the example of our forefathers. Are we assuming as wholesome and as normal an attitude toward plain, honest work as characterized the activities of those who showed us the way? Their precepts and our blessed heritage of a desire and ability to efficiently toil has been unequaled in the annals of the human race.

The fourth commandment of the Decalogue is that "Six days shalt thou labor." This was not for our punishment. It was for our good. In recent years, however, there has evidently been too much of a disposition to substitute speculation, commercial gambling, cleverness, shrewdness, and scheming for clean, straight, constructive achievement through the process of honest individual effort and stable organized endeavor.

Christ in this twelfth year said to his mother: "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" Most of the great men of this country have been sons of widowed mothers. It is extremely probable that much of their greatness is due to the fact that in their early life they were required to be "about their father's business," in order to provide for themselves, for their mother and her family and thereby learning the lessons of responsibility, judgment, and decision to be acquired only by useful work. It frequently becomes too tempting to concentrate on "How much can we get?" instead of "How well can we serve." As sure as night follows day, ultimately, in the great plan of Divine Providence, the law of compensation will work as does the law of gravitation. "He profits most who serves best."

Out of the vortex of destruction and waste of the great war America has again set her face toward the dawn; the dawn of a brighter and a better civilization. To attain this there must come a renewed dedication to personal industry and by precept and example carry on the good work of the fathers. It should be the supreme purpose of every home and school and church, and on every farm and in every kind of business to make work more congenial, more interesting, more equitable, more productive, more attractive. America is calling to-day for more men and women to watch, to stand fast, to be strong, to keep the faith of the fathers, and to work.

The whole plan of creation and existence contemplates the necessity and joy of work. One of the grandest old songs ever set to music is "Work, for the night is coming."

It is not given to all of us to serve our country in a military way. We can not all die for our country, but we can do that thing which now and here confronts us, we can all live for our country, obey its laws, and work for its continued progress. In doing this we must be prepared and we must see to it that future generations are prepared. Preparation is in teaching the mind and hand how to work.

The old idea of human progress was that only by slow and almost imperceptible steps can civilization evolve to its highest forms or the inherent evils of human society overcome. To-day science has so revolutionized most of our early concepts that we find many of the things we have believed in unable to bear the clear light of critical analysis.

The early history of our country demanded the public school. To-day the times demand another equally important step to accelerate the evolution of social progress, to prevent decadence, and to keep step with the rapid strides of the mechanical arts.

The people need and demand a broader, deeper, more complete education, expressed in terms of present-day conditions and made universal just as was the public school. Benjamin Franklin's father took his boy out walking to observe various tradesmen at work in order to learn the youth's particular bent or inclination. All parents do not exercise the same wise forethought, but vocational guidance is now becoming recognized as a legitimate and important function of the public school.

It is said that the most dangerous point in the lives of children in the elementary school is the moment at which they leave it. Unless children are properly directed at this turning point in their lives, the knowledge and discipline acquired at school may be lost and they may become eventually unfit either for employment or for further education.

Boys and girls on leaving school are thrust into industry in great numbers, and are employed merely as process workers and not as apprentices. Too many boys fall into the casual employments or blind-alley jobs that drive them into the ranks of the unskilled, and later they drift along as vocational tramps. New demands are therefore made for solving the problem of vocational education.

In our colleges, seminaries, and universities, where pure science should have its best expression, we too often find instead the most persistent adherence to the old and unscientific methods of memory cramming, with total neglect of mind and hand training. This system is in direct antagonism with the teaching of Spencer, that a more scientific and practical education not only better fits for complete living but for higher attainments and the enjoyment of all that is ethical and æsthetic in life.

It is to meet this emergency in our educational system that the vocational school has come into existence. The remark is often made that our social progress does not keep pace with our mechanical progress. To prepare for the higher civilization that is surely coming, the first and most important step is to introduce a general system of industrial and vocational education which, as a noted expert declares, "produces a new and superior order of people."

If our civilization is to reach its highest attainment, we must come to see that no aim or object of social desire is so great as the best possible development and training of the average citizenship; and the present haste and waste of rushing immature children from the schools into bread-winning life, to become, like the machines they operate in factory and shop, mere automatons, is most harmful and is ultimately destructive of national permanence.

Pupils who enter a vocational school at 14 to 16 years of age can not begin life in any possible manner so hopefully, so advantageously, as through a course that from its very nature draws out and develops the thinking powers and applies the thinking to practical work with the hands. The whole effort of working to create the needs of physical life, aside from its healthful, hygienic value, is admirably adapted to develop the ability to reason from cause to effect and thus strengthen the logical powers.

Man is essentially a creator, and the development of his creative faculties as a necessary part of his education is an economic necessity. It is but little use to develop the receptive powers of the brain without at the same time and as a necessary reflex action developing the active and formative powers of the hand.

Skilled labor is a part of morality and religion and the culture of the mechanical productive faculties a portion of spiritual growth. Attempts at the elevation of the race merely by storing the mind with facts and literary concepts while neglecting to develop the creative powers of the brain and the dexterity of the hand have been discredited. The pathway of all race progress with each individual of the race is identified first by the cultivation of the hand to do, then of the brain to remember how and why.

To express one's self and to develop individuality by the creative skill of the hands is a foundation principle of progress, and we can best develop the latent faculties of the race by adhering to this philosophy. Vocational training is built upon this broad and secure foundation and is allied with all that is best in the constructive ideals of our social and industrial life.

I am in favor of the provisions of the bill. I shall vote for it, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, my opposition to this bill is based solely upon the ground that it is another Federal-aid measure, and Congress, in my opinion, has no authority to vote public funds for such purpose.

I do not question the advisability of educating children in the rural district, but it should be left to the several States, and the Government should not be asked to make any contributions for such a purpose.

No one realizes the value of education better than I do. I want to see all children, regardless of where they reside, receive a proper education.

Being opposed to all Federal-aid measures I intend to be consistent and vote against this appropriation.

The original bill which the chairman of the Committee on Rules tells us will be amended by the chairman of the Committee on Education provided for a continuing appropriation of $6,000,000 annually. This continuing feature will be eliminated. I mention this because it will be shown that the purpose is not only to stimulate the States to appropriate money for vocational education, but as the original bill provided an annual appropriation of $6,000,000 it is clear the committee decided that it should go on for all time. We were told to-day this amendment is entirely satisfactory to the proponents of the proposition. They are willing to take anything they can get.

The boys and girls on the farms are entitled to an education. My State sees to it that they receive one, and it does not require any stimulating from the Federal Government.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has challenged any Member of the House to point out to him any clause in the Constitution that justifies the passage of this bill or extends authority to the Congress to enact such legislation. When this challenge was made I noticed on the floor the presence of a number of Members well qualified on constitutional questions but there was no reply to the gentleman from Virginia's challenge. The people seem to feel they are getting something for nothing in Federal-aid measures. The truth of the matter is the money allocated to the States for such projects is taken from the States in the form of taxes. If the Congress will discontinue these Federal-aid projects then there might be an opportunity to pass a substantial tax reduction bill.

Meritorious projects now stimulated by Federal aid will be carried on by progressive States when the Federal aid is discontinued.

Mrs. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, during my services as a Member of this body, one truth has been brought forcibly to my attention. Whenever legislation which vitally affects the welfare of the youth of our country is presented to the House, the sentiment is unanimously in favor of that legislation, which is just as it should be.

There has never been a time within the memory of living man when the sentiment favoring the hope of our land, the youth of to-day, is as direct, as emphatic, and all prevailing than at the present time.

The welfare and development of those living in the rural sections is of paramount importance and should claim our immediate attention and consideration. The life of our Nation depends largely upon the happiness and contentment, the education and development, the furtherance of the interests of the masses of nature's noblemen, the farmers of this great country.

The bill now under consideration, which carries an additional fund for further development of vocational education in the several States, is a work which it has been my privilege to personally see effectively carried forward in my own State of Kentucky.

I represent a rural and mining section, and we have been confronted with the distressing problem of finding productive farm work for our boys and girls who have been leaving the rural sections seeking other fields for wider opportunity, and there has been a widespread need for vocational aid of this character to conserve and develop the natural resources of the farms, thereby promoting productive agriculture as well as preventing waste of human labor.

I feel this aid, which was initiated in 1917, has obtained the entire confidence in those States where it has been in operation; and when we are confronted with the data that the States are now spending for vocational education $2.65 for each dollar of Federal funds used, we can in part realize the great value this Federal aid is to the States availing themselves of this opportunity. The benefits to the communities thus aided has been of inestimable value.

As I understand it, one of the aims of this great educational work is to bring the school back into line with the farm in a helpful, practical way, and to train the farmers to utilize many new improvements in farming implements and machinery, such as tractors, and so forth, at the same time to teach them to grow and market crops and livestock.

One of the greatest benefits to be derived from the work as carried forward in vocational education is the aid to the home makers. The home is the altar of national love and national service and should be the center but not the boundary of our obligations.

The welfare of this country and the good of its people, all gravitate around the home maker, and I sincerely feel that in the upbuilding and perfecting of the duties which devolve around the housewife, the mother, at the helm, with the spokes of the wheel as typefying the boys and girls in the home, is most surely safeguarded, furthered, and promoted by the work as carried forward under the provisions of this bill.

With all the facts which have been so ably presented by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Education, Mr. REED of New York, and other Members of the House, the Member from the tenth congressional district of Kentucky earnestly hopes that this bill, which is of immeasurable value to the farms, the boys and girls, and last but not least to the homes in the rural sections, and which gives to them the just and fair recognition to which they are entitled, be given the entire support and approval of the House. Hold fast to that which is good.

After all is said and done in life and living, in industry and toil, in all that affects the welfare of men, women, and children, all States are alike hurt and helped by the same causes.

The work as carried forward under the Smith-Hughes bill has been of great value to agriculture and the service to the communities tremendously important.

The pending measure, while it does not involve a large expenditure by the Federal Government, will give a fair and equitable allotment to the several States and will greatly stimulate the rural communities.

Go with me back to the early days and see the masses of the world's workers, the delver in the coal mine on his side crawling to his dark task with no room to stand, see the plodding farmer with his hoe at noonday in the burning sun, see the countless men and women working unceasingly amid the crowded conditions of the factories, all a vast army struggling for existence, then visualize the present day with all its improved methods devised to aid the working classes, and the measures passed by Congress to promote the onward march of civilization. I believe that one of the greatest factors which brought about the sweeping and deserved popular vote received by Herbert Hoover as President of the United States was the recognition by the home makers of this country that he understood their problems and would promote all constructive legislation which would directly and indirectly aid and further their interests.

Home, fireside, and kitchen know the great benefits to be derived from this measure. The housewife knows that a plan, wise and practical, is helping to transmit her work to beneficial results. The hour of battle to win in every avenue of human achievement is at hand. In the midst of the world's fiercest competition we must go forward or we are lost.

To-day we are striving to make the paths of our children and our children's children easier by giving them aid in vocational education, so that those who come after us may move onward, ever forward, and thus pass on into the promised land of turning wheel and glowing forge, of happy homes and smiling fields, where God shall bless them with peace and plenty.

Mr. GREGORY. Mr. Speaker, agriculture is the basic industry of the Nation. It is the foundation of all wealth, the bulwark of all material progress. It buttresses and supports every line of useful human endeavor. While the products of the toil of others add to the comforts and conveniences of life, man could live without them; but the fruits of the farmer's toil of hand and brain are absolutely essential to human existence. In other days the farmer was the leader in the business and political affairs of the country; but in recent years he has been compelled to wage a losing battle, while others have outstripped him.

The clamor of the market place and the din and roar of whirring wheels and spindles in our great industrial centers have so stifled his voice that it is now heard but feebly, if at all. He no longer enjoys the God-given right of fighting for prosperity and success upon a basis of economic equality with other industries. He neither has anything to say about the price which he receives for his raw materials, nor has he any voice in determining what he shall pay for the products out of which his raw materials are finished. He is denied a just share of the wealth which he has created. Through an ingenious manipulation of the tariff and through other means fostered by governmental favoritism, he has seen others wax fat with prosperity, while profits have slipped from his hands and the accumulations of years of honest toil have rapidly faded away. Since 1920 the values of farm lands and of farm products have sustained the appalling shrinkage of more than $30,000,000,000. In the last 15 years the farmer has seen his taxes increase more than 150 per cent, while to-day he is receiving an increase of only 30 per cent above what his crops brought to him 15 years ago. In that period commodities bought by the farmer for use in production, plus wages paid to hired labor, have increased more than 50 per cent, and commodities bought by him for the maintenance of his family have increased 60 per cent in price. The fortitude and the patience with which the farmers of the country have borne their burdens are most remarkable and inspiring, and I am happy to know that, notwithstanding his misfortunes, the love of the farm still abides in the farmer's heart.

The political party which has been in complete control of all branches of the Government for the last eight years, and which will have control of the executive agencies of the Nation for the next four years and of the legislative branch for the next two years, is under solemn pledge "to the development and enactment of measures which will place the agricultural interests of America on a basis of economic equality with other industries to insure its prosperity and success."

I hope time may demonstrate that this solemn pledge made to the electorate was not made for the purpose of catching votes, but that it was made with the determination to live up to it in every respect. I am a Democrat, representing a great constituency composed largely of Democrats, but I want to see the Republican Party redeem this pledge within the very near future, and I shall be glad to join with my Republican friends in Congress in any proper effort to relieve the widespread distress from which the agricultural interests are now suffering.

But for the passage of the Smith-Hughes Act in 1917, and other measures enacted under the Democratic administration then in power, hundreds of thousands of young men now on farms, furnishing the raw materials which give life and prosperity to our industrial centers, would have been lured away from the farm to compete with labor in our cities. While these young men, who have attended vocational schools and have remained upon the farm, have not received the material reward to which they were entitled, they have been impressed with the dignity and importance of their avocation, and dwellers in cities have enjoyed increased benefits.

The bill now under consideration, providing for additional appropriations for the teaching of agriculture and home economics to the boys and girls of the rural sections of our country, will not relieve the distressing conditions now prevailing in agriculture, but it is a step in the right direction. It is a recognition of the importance of training young men and young women to cope with the intricate and complex problems which have become so acute and pressing to all who are engaged in the pursuit of agriculture. In traveling through the district which I have the honor to represent I have witnessed a marvelous transformation in school and community activities since vocational education has been taught in our rural schools.

I attended a number of school fairs held in my district last fall, and was delighted to find the boys and girls deeply interested in all those things which add to the comfort, convenience, and happiness of home life on the farm. At these school fairs there were exhibited the better grades of livestock, poultry, fruits, vegetables, grains, and other farm products, as well as the handiwork of the girls, and these fairs compared favorably with the county fairs of previous years. The intelligent and friendly rivalry engaged in by the different schools must have a beneficial influence on the communities in which they were held. This awakened interest in agriculture not only means that we shall have better crops and better livestock in the future but also that the farmer shall again assume his rightful place in the leadership of the business, political, and social affairs of our country. These vocational schools have also benefited those who, by reason of age, have been unable to attend them, for the enthusiasm of the boys and girls has been carried to their parents, creating a wholesome influence in community life.

In Kentucky, while we are considering this bill, honor is being paid to the 10 leading farmers of that great Commonwealth. One of these so-called "master farmers" to whom our State is paying tribute hails from the county in which I live, and I feel assured that the great work which he has done on the farm has been inspired largely by the teaching of vocational education in the community in which he lives. I know of no greater honor that could have befallen Mr. M. D. Harrison than to have been chosen as one of the 10 "master farmers" of the State of Kentucky, and I rejoice that this distinction has been bestowed upon one of the worthy citizens of my district.

Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the passage of this bill, because I believe its enactment into law will speed the coming of the day when the boys and the girls on the farm will have the same opportunities for happiness and prosperity which are enjoyed by the boys and girls in our great cities.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, The principle involved in the Reed-Menges bill is no departure. It is simply a measure to provide for an increase of the contribution of the Federal Government to high schools for the teaching of agriculture and home economics. It involves the same principle identically as the Smith-Hughes Act. Hundreds of schools have been functioning under this law for several years. The constitutionality of the Smith-Hughes Act has never been tested in the courts. The principle involved is also much the same as that of all measures providing Federal aid to public roads. The general-welfare clause of the Constitution applies to the case and covers this proposed legislation completely.

When the American people adopted the Constitution with the words "promote the general walfare" in its preamble they meant in effect that the Congress of the United States would have the right to legislate on matters tending to "promote the general welfare." No one can dispute the fact that any program tending toward education and culture of the people promotes the general welfare.

Educators and school authorities of my great State of Ohio have the same reverence and respect of the Constitution as citizens of other States. But there is another document of great importance and similar significance to which they frequently look as a justification of their programs for furthering education. The Ordinance of 1787, which antedates the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, contains language of great significance. This document in bold, clear English says:

Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

The Ordinance of 1787 was the constitution for the Northwest Territory. From this territory has been carved five great Commonwealths, of which Ohio is not the least illustrious. Not only does this immortal document recognize education along with religion and morality as the very corner stone of a substantial national existence, but pledges itself and the governmental agencies established by virtue of it to a program of furtherance of the means of education. The pioneers who settled the great Northwest Territory insisted that the church and the school should keep company with the advance guard of growth and progress. In keeping with this spirit there was established at Athens, in my congressional district, the first college west of the Allegheny Mountains. This college has operated with great credit to a long list of illustrious instructors and a longer list of equally illustrious alumni. This college is now known as Ohio University and is a living monument to the spirit of the sturdy pioneer and a great credit to a magnificent Commonwealth.

The spirit that actuated the Ordnance of 1787 and the spirit that established Athens College is the same spirit that causes the legislators of Ohio, year after year, to appropriate large sums of money to those sections of the State where land is poor and cheap and where the tax revenues are not sufficient to maintain adequate school facilities. In Ohio the policy is "to educate the children where they live and to tax wealth where it is found." Truly, in Ohio we maintain that "the means of education are necessary to good government."

It is little wonder, then, that the educators and school authorities of Ohio were ready to cooperate with the program of education in agriculture and rural economics as provided in the Smith-Hughes Act. Encouraged by the spirit of these advance agents of child welfare in Ohio I am proud to lend my best assistance to the passing of the Reed-Menges bill.

My State has made wonderful progress in vocational education under the provisions of the Smith-Hughes Act. Last year there were 196 high-school departments of vocational agriculture in Ohio. These departments were distributed over 77 counties of the State. In addition to the 4-year courses for high-school students, part-time and evening courses were offered to out-of-school young men and adult farmers. Nearly 10,000 students were enrolled in our various agricultural courses during the year. An important part of the vocational agriculture program is the home-project work. High-school boys produced over $300,000 worth of products from their projects during the year.

The State program in vocational home economics has been equally effective. Nearly 11,000 students were enrolled in vocational home economics courses in Ohio during the past year. Additional schools in my district are deprived of these vocational courses because of lack of funds. This bill will provide some of these additional funds. In my State more than 97 per cent of the Smith-Hughes money is used for the direct support of teachers in local communities. All of the money appropriated under this bill will be used for the establishment of new departments of vocational agriculture and home economics in my State and district. I believe in legislation which will give help to my constituents right out in the home communities where they live, and I support it most loyally.

My district has 10 high-school vocational agricultural departments which have functioned very effectively. One of these vocational agriculture instructors in my district has conducted an evening course for 14 adult farmers of his community which has continued for nearly two years. Evening classes are held once each week. These farmers carry out on their home farms the practices which they discuss in class.

I know of one instance in one of my counties where the teacher of one of these agriculture schools contributed many times more to the financial benefit of the farmers in that community than his salary amounted to. In his spare time he devised a cooperative plan whereby the growers of small vegetables and berries in that community could market their crop cooperatively. Instead of peddling their crops in competition with each other in a market that was always glutted they sent their products away to larger and higher markets in carload lots at a much better price and at a saving of the labor of hauling off and peddling. This also left a better market to those who were not able to enter the cooperation by reason of location or lack of equipment. This is an instance of practical benefit to the parents and the community. Likewise it is an illustration of where the school is brought closer in contact to the patrons. The best results in any line of education are accomplished when there is a healthy cooperation between the school and the home.

THE LATE HON. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request on the part of the Alabama delegation in Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution by that delegation in reference to the life, character, and public services of the late Senator Underwood, of that State, be incorporated in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution is as follows:

The delegation from Alabama in the House of Representatives has learned of the death of Senator Oscar W. Underwood with profound regret and genuine personal sorrow. We feel that it may be said in all candor that no American of the present generation has contributed more richly than he to the annals of the Nation.

Intrusted as he was with many positions of eminence and responsibility, he brought to the discharge of his public duties such high order of courage and intellectual capacity as to win and deserve the admiration and affection of his associates as well as the people of the entire country.

For 20 years as a Representative in Congress and 12 years as a Senator from Alabama, he rendered conspicuous and enduring service; his ability and character having won for him the official leadership of his party in both branches of Congress.

In his field of international relations he likewise achieved signal distinction, having been a member of the Washington Disarmament Conference and the sixth International Conference of American States at Habana in 1928.

At two national conventions of the Democratic Party he was a formidable contender for the presidential nomination.

In addition to being attracted by his intellectual endowments, the friends of Senator Underwood loved him for his personal charm, for his genial comradeship, and for unwavering candor and intellectual courage.

A great son of Alabama has gone to his reward. We reverently cherish his memory and honor his achievements. The historian will record the name of Oscar W. Underwood as one of the great Americans.

TO AMEND SECTION 321 OF THE PENAL CODE

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 7200) passed by the Senate, a bill to amend section 321 of the Penal Code, and to agree to the Senate amendment and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 7200) to amend section 321 of the Penal Code.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is this?

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment which has been just read.

Mr. BEGG. Has the gentleman obtained permission to take it from the Speaker's table as yet?

The SPEAKER. The question is, Is there objection? The Senate amendment has been read.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I recall this is a bill of the Judiciary Committee of the House, and I am just wondering if the gentleman who called up the matter had consulted the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House as to whether this amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. In the absence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] who is sick, I consulted the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] who has seen most of the members of the committee as nearly as he could and found no objection to the amendment. It is acceptable to the introducer, who was myself. It simply extends to the Territory the measure of local self-government that is now in fact in the possession of Porto Rico and the Philippines, and I hope very much there will be no objection.

Mr. DOMINICK. I have not had an opportunity to compare the Senate amendment with the original House bill, but I think the House bill was entirely stricken out and a new Senate bill inserted, but I think under the circumstances the gentleman may well let the matter go over.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. If the gentleman will reserve that for a moment, the bill passed by the Senate is substantially the same as the bill passed by the House, except it has been checked over by the legislative drafting clerks, which was not done in the preparation of mine.

Mr. DOMINICK. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his request for the time being.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. I will withdraw the request.

Mr. DOMINICK. I would like to look into the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Hawaii withdraws his request.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to offer for printing an amendment to the pending naval bill and ask that it may lie on the table. I intend to offer it before the conclusion of the discussion on the bill. I ask that the amendment may be read by the clerk.

The amendment was read, ordered to be printed, and to lie on the table, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. NORRIS to the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

On page 3, at the end of line 3, strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following:

"and the President is hereby requested to ask the Government of Great Britain to enter into an agreement with the Government of the United States providing for a limitation on behalf of said Governments in the construction of naval vessels such as are provided for in paragraph (a) of section 1 hereof; and during the negotiation for such an agreement, the authority to construct the naval vessels provided for in said paragraph (a) of section is hereby suspended. If such an agreement is entered into, then the authority to construct naval vessels as provided in said paragraph (a) of section 1 is hereby modified to the extent necessary to carry out said agreement."

MARKETING OF LIVESTOCK

Mr. NORRIS. I have here a resolution passed by the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska in regard to the marketing of livestock, and I think under the rule it should be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the memorial.

The memorial was read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

Whereas the livestock producers of this country are, from justice and necessity, entitled to a competitive market for the sale of their livestock, governed only by the natural law of competition and supply and demand; and

Whereas during the last few years the system of direct or private buying has so expanded as to endanger the open competitive livestock markets which have been built up in this country over a period of 50 years; and

Whereas if unchecked, this system will in a short time actually destroy such open and competitive livestock markets, and will necessarily involve the abolition of competition and governmental regulation in the purchase of livestock; and

Whereas it is the opinion of the vast majority of the stock growers that the open competitive markets should prevail and that the direct or private system of buying is economically unsound and dangerous to the livestock interest of the country; and

Whereas approximately 40 per cent of the hogs now being shipped to the big terminal markets are bought in the country by packing agents and shipped to private stockyards and by this system are kept out of the competitive market: Therefore be it

Resolved, That our Representatives in Congress are hereby requested and strongly urged to conduct a thorough and fair investigation of the questions of marketing livestock in all of its phases; such investigation to be made on a basis which will inspire confidence in the conclusions and result among the producers, the consumers and the packers, the stockyards, and all other marketing agencies; that will tend to settle adequately the questions which have perplexed the country and Congress so much in the past concerning marketing problems of the livestock industry; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each of our Representatives in Congress; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to other State legislatures now in session, and that they be asked to send a similar resolution to their Representatives in the National Congress.

Ayes, 75; nays, 7; not voting, 18.

G. R. CURRY.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it a concurrent resolution?

Mr. BAYARD. It is a Senate resolution referring a bill to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senator whether there will be any debate on the resolution.

Mr. BAYARD. I am sure it will lead to no debate.

The resolution (S. Res. 314) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length and considered as in Committee of the Whole, as follows:

Delano, of the city of Washington, and Irwin B. Laughlin, of Pennsylvania, on January 21, 1929, be filled by the reappointment of the present incumbents for the statutory term of six years.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEVELOPMENT OF VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1731) to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories, which were, on page 1, line 6, to strike out the figures "1929" and insert "1930"; on page 1, line 7, to strike out "11" and insert "4"; on page 1, line 8, to strike out all after the word "year" down to and including "$6,000,000" in line 10.

Mr. GEORGE. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

McMaster	Reed, Pa.	Thomas, Idaho

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I submit the following unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the proposed agreement.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That on the calendar day of Monday, February 4, 1929, upon the approval of the Journal the Senate will proceed to consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes; and no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 30 minutes upon the bill or more than once or longer than 30 minutes on any amendment offered thereto; and that after the hour of 4 o'clock p. m., on said calendar day, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any pending amendment, and no amendment shall be proposed after 4 o'clock p. m. of said day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator, before the unanimous-consent request is entered into, whether it is the intention that no other legislation meanwhile will come up, except by unanimous consent, other than general appropriation bills?

Mr. CURTIS. Of course, no business could come up except by unanimous consent. It is understood that if no one wants to talk on the naval bill, an appropriation bill will be taken up.

Mr. HARRISON. So nothing else will be brought up in the meanwhile except by unanimous consent?

Mr. CURTIS. Nothing that I know of could be brought up except by unanimous consent.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, what is the reason for the second part of the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. CURTIS. It was inserted because one of the Senators wanted an hour, and it was thought best to give him the hour up to 4 o'clock; and there might be others who would want to talk that long.

Mr. DILL. I am perfectly willing to have a limitation on debate, but it seems to me that the first limitation is ample.

Mr. CURTIS. Only a great deal more time might be consumed, and surely debate would be closed by 4 o'clock, under the 30-minute limitation.

Mr. DILL. The debate might be concluded by 4 o'clock and it might not be.

Mr. CURTIS. We would have all of to-day and to-morrow and the next two days to debate the measure without any limitation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington seriously objects to the 10-minute limitation, I would suggest to the Senator from Kansas that he make it 15 minutes instead of 10.

Mr. DILL. The matter was taken up with me, and I said I was perfectly willing to have a limitation on debate, but I do not think we ought to make such an arrangement as is here proposed.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator will remember that when I suggested to him that we limit debate he spoke about the 10-minute limitation, and it was to accommodate one of the Senators that the hour was changed from 2 o'clock to 4 o'clock, limiting debate after that hour to 10 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest that under the first part of the unanimous-consent request a Senator could speak 30 minutes on the bill and 30 minutes on any amendment, and if there were four or five amendments he would have an hour and a half or two hours. I do not think anyone would want to speak so long.

Mr. DILL. If some Senator got the floor, he could talk until 4 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. He could speak on the bill but once, so that while he might make a speech of an hour in length he could do it but once. After that he would be limited to 30 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. My point is that no Senator here would want to speak so long as an hour or an hour and a half, at least I do not think there is anyone who would desire to occupy so much time. The measure has been discussed at length already, and any Senator would have 10 minutes more on any amendment after the hour of 4 o'clock, the debate going over into the next day if necessary. Any Senator could make a 10-minute speech on any amendment after 4 o'clock.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope there will be no objection to the proposed agreement.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the morning papers and the afternoon papers of to-day carry a statement in which my name is used, which I think justifies me in rising to a question of the highest personal privilege.

I have been in Congress for 16 years, in this and the other body, and this is the first time I have ever taken the floor under such circumstances. Usually I pay no attention to what is stated in the newspapers of a personal nature, but in this case I think I am justified in paying some attention to the article.

I refer to a dispatch from Columbus, Ohio, in which it is stated:

> John F. Eckhardt, acting assistant prohibition administrator, Columbus, the Government's star witness, testified that Buckley told him in October that "higher-ups" were coming to him about a raid on the Jackson Brewing Co., Cincinnati, in which beer alleged to have been intended for an American Legion group on the way to a convention was seized.
> Buckley represented to him, Eckhardt said, that those "higher-ups" didn't wish the matter stirred with a political campaign in progress and named Cooper and Senator FESS as two of the "higher-ups."

Mr. President, I never heard of the case herein mentioned. I did not know that there was any effort to raid an institution of any sort. I never talked with anyone about it, and had I talked with Mr. Buckley I certainly would have remembered it, because he was once a student of mine and I have watched him as he has progressed and has been elected and reelected treasurer of our State. If I had ever had any conversation with him about a matter of this sort I could not have forgotten it. I state here and now that I never talked with him on a matter of this sort at any time. I do not know who Mr. Eckhardt is except the position that he holds. I would not know him if I were to meet him.

The only thing that I ever mentioned in connection with this matter was just a few weeks ago, long after Congress had assembled and long after the election, when the district attorney for the southern district of Ohio stated to me that he thought there was information in his hands which might lead to an indictment of Mr. Buckley. It was a shocking statement to me, and my comment to him, which I do not hesitate now to repeat, was that "there is no course open to you except to go to the bottom of the matter."

I want to state now and here that not then nor at any other time have I ever in any way interfered with the enforcement of the law, but in every case where my indorsement would go to an officer it was specifically made as a condition that the law would be enforced. The men who hold these positions in Ohio will testify that that is the condition I have made. I pronounce this statement, whether it is malicious or not, without a scintilla of foundation in fact.

Mr. FESS subsequently said: Mr. President, just a moment after the close of my remarks a representative of the Associated Press handed me a note reading as follows:

> Eckhardt has just retracted all his charges against you.

This indicates that it would have been better for me to have kept still about the matter and paid no attention to it.

DIVERSION OF COMMERCE FROM UNITED STATES PORTS (S. DOC. NO. 212)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith the report of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Interstate Commerce Commission in response to Resolution No. 230 adopted by the Senate on May 7, 1928, requesting an investigation of the factors which are contributing to the diversion of commerce from ports of the United States to Canadian ports and practical remedies for preventing such diversion.

I also transmit herewith the separate report of the United States Shipping Board in response to the same resolution.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

(Inclosures: Joint report; report of the United States Shipping Board.)

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 29, 1929.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I move that the message and accompanying papers be printed as a Senate document and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 14800) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers, sailors, and marines of said war, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana, Mr. NORBECK, and Mr. GERRY conferees on the part of the Senate.

PROHIBITION

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, if there is no objection, I would like to have printed in the RECORD an article by President A. Lawrence Lowell, of Harvard University, on Reconstruction and Prohibition, together with a letter sent to me by Mr. J. R. Raw, general secretary of the National Council of the Licensed Trade of New Zealand, with reference to the results of the prohibition plebiscite in New Zealand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Atlantic Monthly, February, 1929]

RECONSTRUCTION AND PROHIBITION

By A. Lawrence Lowell

(Copyright, 1929, by The Atlantic Monthly Co. All rights reserved)

I

In the spring of 1918 an American said to a friend that the young men taking part in the war had been raised to such a pitch of exaltation that they would live on a higher plane than their fathers. The answer was a chilling caution not to believe it; that the war would be followed by an era of materialism. The friend then pointed out that such a reaction had generally occurred after great wars, and that the result is a natural one, because, as strenuous physical exertion is followed by fatigue, so a violent moral effort, when the cause that produced it is removed, is succeeded by moral lassitude and therewith a turning of attention into very different channels. That this revulsion of spirit should be expected to follow peace is now recognized by those who have thought about the subject; but there are other aftereffects of war of quite a different character that merit consideration.

The very reaction that follows the cessation of hostilities has some unexpected results. War brings a great wave of emotion, and when with peace that recedes in a low tide of feeling, it does not leave things as they were before. Some traditions have been swept away, some habits changed; but in the swirl, the eddies, the cross currents of the falling waters it is not easy to distinguish the old landmarks and see which have been destroyed and which remain.

To most people the return of peace brings the desire to be about one's own business, but in some earnest souls it stimulates an ambition to effect a great moral reform. In the stress of war individuals and peoples do things that would seem impossible under ordinary conditions. Obstacles that otherwise would be insuperable are overcome. Familiar restraints and impeding habits are loosened, and enthusiasts do not appreciate that this state of mind will fade into the light of common day. To them a millennium seems within reach, and in the confused state of opinion that prevails they are tempted to strive for objects that in other times they would regard as remote or unattainable.

Such an experience followed the Civil War. In that case rancor against the southerners and philanthropy toward the negroes combined to produce the measures known as reconstruction. The policy had such disastrous results, and at the present day has so few, if any, defenders, that we find it hard to attribute high motives to the men who approved it. Yet many of them had the best intentions. They not only shared the general conviction that slavery must be forever abolished, but believed that the sole difference between the races was the color of the skin. On this basis they insisted on justice as they saw it—that is, absolute equality of every kind—for the negro, and certainly justice for the oppressed is in itself a noble motive.

Everyone knows the result; much bad government by carpetbaggers supported by an inexperienced and ignorant vote of the freedmen; maladministration; financial mismanagement; economic and social distress; resistance by force and fraud through the shotgun and the tissue ballot. In most of the seceding States the right of the negro to vote could be maintained only by the presence of Federal troops, and this was continued until President Hayes, elected by the political party responsible for the policy of reconstruction, decided to withdraw them. As head of the Nation not only had he sworn to execute its laws, but these amendments had specially empowered, and therefore intended, the Federal Government to provide for their enforcement. Nevertheless he made up his mind that to attempt to fulfill a clear constitutional obligation would be both futile and demoralizing, and posterity has been convinced that he was right. The result was to leave the enforcement of the provisions for negro suffrage practically to the States instead of the Federal Government. Moreover, the longest and most elaborate section of the fourteenth amendment has been from the outset a dead letter. It provides that if in any State the suffrage is restricted the representation in Congress shall be proportionally diminished; but although in many States, both North and South, the right to vote has been and is now restricted by clauses requiring the ability to read and write or other qualifications, no serious effort has ever been made to carry this constitutional provision into effect. The fourteenth amendment has had the effect of enlarging the authority of the Supreme Court in matters wholly unrelated to its main object of negro rights, but so far as enforcement of the suffrage by the national administration is concerned both this amendment and the fifteenth have become well-nigh obsolete.

Although the policy of reconstruction, as distinguished from the abolition of slavery, failed of its object, and without being repealed has been discarded, yet its consequences have by no means passed away. It has left in the South a resentment that the Civil War alone would not have provoked, and that a half century of noninterference with the treatment of the racial question by the States and of growing prosperity in the South did not obliterate. Sectional distrust of the party which enacted the policy, but had long repudiated it, remained an active force in public life; and, contrary to many common interests, dominated until the last election the politics of the former Confederate States. Although within those 50 years two foreign wars occurred in which North and South fought side by side, although no one in the South wishes to-day that the Civil War had resulted in Confederate victory and dissolution of the Union, yet the errors of reconstruction still cast their shadow upon the land south of Mason and Dixon's line.

Another unfortunate effect of the principles held by the extremists at the close of the Civil War lies in their lack of influence over the treatment of the Negro after the policy of reconstruction was abandoned. Most of the people in the North, convinced that this policy had been a mistake and that they did not understand the question, subsided into a position if not of indifference at least of self-distrust, and refrained from trying to interfere with conditions which they felt that they did not comprehend.

Apart from a few men deeply interested in negro education, the northern philanthropists, on the other hand, who cared intensely about the negroes, have failed to recognize that the position of the races in the South presented any peculiar question; or rather they assumed that it had only one simple solution, the absolute equality of the races for all purposes; and they have tended to attribute any opposition to this principle to unworthy motives. Thus prejudice enhanced prejudice, and men who, by a serious study of the problem, might have had an effect on the treatment of the negro, and bettered his life, lost that chance, exasperating rather than moderating southern sentiment.

II

Such in brief has been the history of a policy framed by extremists at the close of a great war; founded largely on a philanthropic impulse regardless of actual conditions and obstacles; sanctioned by the Constitution, but impossible of execution; and finally abandoned without repeal of the constitutional provisions by which it was decreed. Another amendment, not wholly dissimilar in its philanthropic motive, has been adopted at the end of another war, and people are watching the results. Unlike reconstruction, prohibition was enacted with no admixture of bitterness against a beaten foe. So far as the incentive was not economic it was wholly moral; yet, like reconstruction, it was the work of people who had long advocated as a minority a reform which the war enabled them to carry into effect. As with reconstruction, a vigorous dislike to the policy is making the practical enforcement of the law difficult if not impossible.

Prohibition had long been advocated in different parts of the country and had been adopted in various forms. One of these was local option by towns or cities; and this was in large measure successful. In rural communities where the sentiment was general, and in suburbs of those cities which did not adopt it, it resulted in suppressing open barrooms, but not in preventing people who wanted intoxicating liquor from obtaining it for themselves. A number of States went further, forbidding manufacture and sale throughout their territory. For many years a strict enforcement of these laws was impeded by the decision of the Supreme Court in the Original Package case. Interstate commerce, being within the domain of the Federal Government, could not be restricted by statutes of the States; and the court held that so long as merchandise was in the original package in which it was shipped from another State it was a subject of interstate commerce, regulated only by Federal law. Finally in 1913 Congress passed an act withdrawing from Federal protection the shipment of liquor into any State that forbade its sale, thus leaving each State free to enact its exclusion altogether. This is important to bear in mind, because people in discussing the Volstead Act may recall only the condition when States could not prevent the admission of liquor within their boundaries. Of course, with the freedom of internal trade and the absence of State customhouses—one of the greatest benefits conferred by the framers of the Constitution and a principal source of our national development and prosperity—it is more difficult for a State than for the Nation to guard its approaches; but on the other hand there is more likelihood of a general community of opinion in most of the States than in the country as a whole, and that is of no small importance in the enforcement of a law.

Nevertheless, to enforce a law against the opinion of any considerable minority is always difficult. In some States, where opinion has been sufficiently harmonious, prohibition has, no doubt, been effective; but in others, where opinion has been divided, this has not been the case. Maine has had a constitutional provision of that kind for half a century; but in Bangor a system—devised, it is said, by the chief justice of her highest court—was long in use whereby the provision was turned in practice into high license. The keeper of a disreputable saloon was prosecuted until driven out of business, while the keeper of an orderly one was prosecuted every other year, fined a fixed sum, and was otherwise unmolested. The system continued until an attempt was made to apply it in Portland, when the prohibitionists became indignant and it had to be given up. The provision in a State constitution was thus made to work for a time in Bangor as if it were one for local option. Believing that obedience to law is the basis of civil society, I am not excusing this, but merely pointing out the difficulty of carrying out a statute against strong opposition, and the way it may be perverted where many people regard it as unreasonable.

That the prohibitionists who urged the passage of the eighteenth amendment were actuated by the highest moral purpose no one has a right to doubt; that there was a real evil to combat is not less certain. There is almost no desire to restore the open saloon; but the question is whether, in the enthusiasm for suppressing drunkenness, they went, like the advocates of reconstruction, too far, and thereby imperiled the object in view. It has been said that, had the Volstead Act set the limit of alcohol at a point below which wine and beer may indeed, but seldom do, intoxicate those who drink them, the law would have been so generally accepted and obeyed that the bootlegger would have found no sufficient market to sustain his trade. Whether that be true or not is a matter of conjecture, and it is proverbial that the most useless of pursuits is hypothetics, or the study of those things that might have happened and did not.

When national prohibition went into effect men who had no personal objection to wine, who had in the past served it on their tables, were more concerned about obeying the law than they seem to be to-day. The host would sometimes remark that what he offered was not illegal, for it was a pre-war purchase. One hears little of that now. There are many people, and let us hope there always will be many, who refuse to break the law, although not satisfied with it; but they appear to become fewer year by year. At first clubs and hotels were careful in their conduct. Member or guest might bring his own supply, but neither directly nor indirectly would they assist; but the observance of the law is certainly less strict to-day. Bootlegging is universally believed to have become a vast organized business employing a large capital, and in most cities no one who wants liquor seems to find any serious difficulty in getting it. In short, as everyone knows, the law is not enforced, and as time goes on it seems to be less and less effective.

There is no reason to suppose that the national administration has been intentionally lax; but it is doubtful whether sumptuary laws can ever be enforced against the resistance of any large minority. Lawyers draw a distinction between malum in se and malum prohibitum—that is, between those acts which are intrinsically wrong in themselves and those which are offenses because made so by statute; or, in other words, between acts universally esteemed immoral and those which are not generally so regarded but in the interest of the common welfare are forbidden by legislation.

Laws dealing with acts of the latter class which involve obvious danger to others are easily enforced, because everyone has an interest that his neighbors should not put him or his property in peril; but this is not true where the effect on other people is remote or not potent. That is the reason why sumptuary laws, affecting what seems to be only personal conduct, are difficult to enforce. Many excellent people believe that drinking any intoxicant, even to an extent that does not intoxicate, is inherently immoral; but that is very far from a general opinion, and a large part of those who do not hold it feel that interference with their personally innocent habits is not justified by a claim of benefit to the public of which they are not convinced. Whether this attitude be right or wrong, it is a fact that must be taken into account in considering the possibility of enforcing universal prohibition. There is little use in abusing those who oppose the law as the advocates of reconstruction reproached the southerners in the earlier years of that policy. Epithets do not alter facts. The question discussed in this article is not whether prohibition would be a benefit if it could be carried into effect, but whether it can be enforced; and, if not, whether the present condition is better than some modification of the policy.

Moreover, if it be true that the men who buy and drink bootlegged liquor are evil-minded persons led by a perverted appetite to encourage violations of law to the injury of the public, then they ought to be punished. It is they who support the traffic by supplying the demand, for without them it would quickly die out. Yet no attempt is made to treat the individual purchase of liquor as a crime or to prosecute those who do so as participants in the offense of selling it. The fact is that the public does not regard buying liquor for personal consumption as a crime; grand juries would not indict or petit juries convict. It is one of many cases where a policy can not be carried out because even those who desire it are not willing to take the measures necessary for its enforcement. On the other hand, it is almost mathematically demonstrable that the present practice of proceeding against bootleggers alone can not be effectual because the profit increases with the risk. Under such conditions the unlawful trade will be amply remunerative unless the proportion of successful violations is small. The same principle applies to blockade running in war, which continues until the risk of capture is very great, until, to use the formal term, the blockade is made effective. Now, it is evident that so far the attempt to exclude liquor from the United States, to prevent its sale—in short, to keep people who want it from getting it—has not been successful and does not seem to be getting more so. To judge, therefore, from experience up to this time, it seems highly improbable that the blockade of liquor can be made effective.

III

Public sentiment is sometimes in favor of a law but against its enforcement. That sounds like a paradox, and perhaps it is, because people are not always rational or consistent. Those who are enthusiastic about a measure strive earnestly to procure its enactment, and sometimes when they have done so rest satisfied with their victory, assume that the matter is settled, and suspend organized effort, while others who dislike the law are contented if it is not enforced. This has often been true of old laws that have become partly obsolete, like the Sunday laws which many people do not want either repealed or strictly enforced. But it is needless to go for examples beyond our subject of liquor. During the half century that Maine was governed by her own constitutional prohibition it was commonly and notoriously violated. People who believed in prohibition had their law, others who wanted liquor had that; and, save for occasional outbursts of righteous indignation, there seemed to be general contentment with the situation.

The eighteenth amendment no more effectively enforced than it is to-day, and than it is likely to be in future, might prove to be the path of least resistance and greatest general satisfaction were it not that it involves grave evils, for the present condition is very demoralizing. That it has produced corruption among Government agents, and in some States in the police, is universally believed. Like the policy of reconstruction in the South it has turned many respectable people who ought to be patterns of law and order into lawbreakers. It is responsible for no small amount of violence and crime. Men who are in a position to know assert that the murders in Chicago are mainly, if not wholly, due to quarrels among the bootleggers and between them and the hijackers. Such conditions are certain to last so long as an illegal and lucrative traffic is conducted on a large scale, supported by sales to citizens in good standing, while the public authorities endeavor to suppress it by force. The country is at odds with itself. There is a lack of harmony in principles that causes friction, maladjustment, and confusion. It is not a healthy condition or one that ought to continue.

It may be assumed that the majority of the American people are in favor of the present law; but that does not settle the matter. Perhaps the majority were in favor of the rigorous measures of reconstruction even at the time when President Hayes withdrew the Federal troops. However that may have been, the withdrawal was not due to a change in the opinion of the majority but to the harm done by striving to enforce the policy upon a disaffected minority. It was rapidly causing a disrespect for law, and, bad as the result has been, it would have been worse had the policy not been abandoned. Statesmanship is not a theory but an art, and the true aim of that art is the creation of a harmonious community life on as high a plane as possible by the acceptance, as nearly universal as may be, of common standards of public and private conduct. Too great uniformity makes for stagnation, and the happy nation is one that enjoys agreement in fundamental principles with toleration and mutual respect in nonessentials. An attempt to produce uniformity by coercion causes a revulsion that lessens the sense of solidarity, of mutual dependence, and the support of a common interest.

Prohibition has no doubt done good. It has abolished the saloon; it has diminished the absence from the factory of workmen through drink, the waste of their wages on liquor, and the consequent suffering of their families. But it has done this at the cost of lowering the standards of many citizens and officials. In short, it seems to have been an economic benefit not unmixed with a distinct moral detriment. The object should be to retain the first of these and eliminate the second.

Of course, if the enforcement could be made thoroughly effective and maintained for a considerable time, the moral evils of the present condition might be removed and habits established that would prevent their recurrence. Whether this is possible or not should be considered, not from a dogmatic or sentimental standpoint but from that of a true statesman with an open mind, free from prejudice, by a careful examination of facts and conditions and in the light of experience. If after such a study enforcement appears to be feasible and desirable by methods which can practicably be applied, it should be so administered as to be really effective instead of being, as now, vexatious, demoralizing, and inefficient.

If, on the contrary, it should appear that the law as it now stands can not be fully enforced, it should be so modified as to preserve those features which are most important, such as the abolition of the open saloon, and it should permit communities which desire and can carry out absolute exclusion of liquor to enjoy that privilege, while at the same time discarding things which are not essential for this purpose and are found to impede enforcement. The question seems to be one of major importance, and the quality needed to find the answer is not rhetoric but statesmanship, not enthusiasm but calm and mature reflection. The future will depend upon the moderation of people with conflicting opinions, and especially upon that of the prohibitionists. If the men who like cocktails and carry hip flasks demand that there shall be no restraints whatever on their liberty to drink as they please, irrespective of the common welfare, bootleggers will be ready to supply them, and no compromise will be reached. If the prohibitionists insist that their principle unabated shall remain the formal law, they will probably make enforcement impossible, hamper the growth of temperance, and perpetuate violation of the law and of good order. This last is the most serious aspect of the matter.

As a people we have been law-abiding, not by compulsion from above but from a sense of the fitness of things. The success of self-government is based on a confidence that one's neighbors will conform to the established rules of conduct, and anything that undermines that confidence strikes at the root of our civil life.

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE LICENSED TRADE OF NEW ZEALAND, Wellington, December 15, 1928.

WILLIAM CABELL BRUCE, Esq.
(Messrs. Fisher, Bruce & Fisher),
Barristers and Solicitors,
Baltimore, U. S. A.

DEAR SIR: Now that the final figures of the voting on the licensing issue have been announced, it becomes my duty, as well as a great pleasure, to write to you to express my own appreciation, as well as the heartfelt thanks of my council, for the very valuable help your able and convincing letter to the people of New Zealand was in assisting them to come to a rational and sound conclusion on the evil effects of the operation of prohibition in the United States.

My council as a whole has expressed their deep sense of gratitude to you. The personal touch and appeal by you was in their view irresistible. Although you are thousands of miles away, you will, I trust, be able to realize that you contributed in no little measure to the gratifying result—the overwhelming defeat of prohibition in New Zealand. The result was:

Votes for—
National continuance	374,502
State purchase and control	64,276
	438,778
National prohibition	294,453
	144,325

So that the majority against prohibition reached the unprecedented total of 144,325—over 100,000 votes more against prohibition than at the previous poll three years ago.

For over 30 years we have been fighting the prohibition issue, and we have this time gained so decisive a victory that we are satisfied the cause of our opponents has been set back for at least a generation. But the fight will be renewed in another three years—unless the law is altered—so that we will in all probability have again recourse to you and our other friends throughout the United States for such help as you and they have accorded us on this—to us—most conspicuously fortunate occasion.

Again thanking you and trusting that your own efforts to secure a modification of the Volstead Act more in keeping with the ideals of liberty and toleration will succeed, I have the honor to be, with kind regards,

Yours gratefully,

J. R. RAW, General Secretary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII, beginning——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. BRUCE. I object.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the object of the request? Is not the cruiser bill to be discussed further to-day?

Mr. BRUCE. It really is in violation of the understanding we arrived at only a few minutes ago.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood that the Senator from Iowa did not care to finish his speech this afternoon, and I was asked to submit the request. I withdraw it.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire, first, to call attention to an error in the RECORD of yesterday. I am quoted as saying:

> I regret that in this instance I have to disagree both with the Republican President and the President elect here and the standpatter insurgents who were on the other side in 1924.

Mr. President, that is quite the contrary of what I actually said. I said that I had to defend the President and the President elect upon this question of the time limit in this bill against these standpatters who are now insurging against their own leader and their leader elect.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber?

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. BROOKHART. Of course, I can not quote the exact language I used, but I am quite sure that was the idea I expressed, and that was certainly the situation as it existed at that time.

The President of the United States had declared in his message for the elimination of the time limit in the cruiser bill. Then a Representative in Congress gave out a statement that the President elect was in favor of retaining the time limit. That called for the telegram from the President elect to President Coolidge, which was put in the RECORD on yesterday. In that telegram Mr. Hoover states distinctly that he concurs with the ideas of the President upon this bill; and I myself am in concurrence with the suggestion that the time limit should be removed. If the time limit shall be removed, the biggest part of the controversy will have been removed, but some of our friends who claim to be regular Republicans, and who claim to follow the leadership of their party, are now insurgents not only against the present leader of the party but against the new leader whom they have chosen; and I rather think it is about time for us to hold a caucus of the Republican Party and oust them.

Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. SHORTRIDGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield first to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he would vote for the bill if the time-limit clause were eliminated?

Mr. BROOKHART. I myself would not vote for the bill at all, but there are a number of other Senators who would vote for it if that clause were eliminated who otherwise will vote against it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BROOKHART. I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the time limit shall be removed from the bill, before the Senator from Iowa finishes his address will he be good enough to tell us what of value will then be left of the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, interrupting the Senator from Iowa, may I ask him——

Mr. BROOKHART. The remark of the Senator from California is very sarcastic, as I interpret it, but I will say that there will not be so many offensive things left in the bill if the time-limit clause shall be eliminated from it. In that event the most offensive thing will be out of the bill. Now I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say, in answer to the Senator from California, that when certain persons wanted to have a naval program involving an expenditure of $740,000,000, and the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House, carrying out their wishes, introduced a bill for that purpose, it had no limitation clause, but merely provided for the construction of the ships without respect to time. This is the first time where a limiting clause, so far as I have been able to ascertain, has been put on such a bill.

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President; that is not the case.

Mr. HARRISON. When was the other time?

Mr. HALE. The Senator will recall that in the bill authorizing the eight cruisers which are now under process of construction a time limit was set for their laying down.

Mr. BROOKHART. But originally there was no time limit set for these 15 cruisers.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill to which the Senator from Maine refers was in 1924, was it not? I have forgotten just when those eight cruisers were authorized.

Mr. HALE. It was in 1924.

Mr. HARRISON. Are all of those vessels in course of construction now?

Mr. HALE. All of them are in course of construction.

Mr. HARRISON. What was the provision as to time in the case of those vessels?

Mr. HALE. I can get the law and inform the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. It is quite true that the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House in 1927, in offering the bill at that time, placed no time limit in it, did he?

Mr. HALE. No; such a provision was not in the bill as introduced.

Mr. HARRISON. The chairman of the committee represents the majority party.

Mr. HALE. Whether or not under that program, if it had been adopted, a time limit would have been attached, I can not say.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, it becomes pertinent, then, to inquire at whose instance or request the time limit was put on in the case of this bill?

Mr. HARRISON. I am not close enough to the powers that be to give the Senator that information.

Mr. HALE. The time limit was put on by the Naval Affairs Committee of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was put on at the instance of the Secretary of the Navy, was it not?

Mr. HALE. The Secretary of the Navy, I think, does not object to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I do not know at whose instance it was put on, however.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator from California mean to infer——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit another observation, I understand the Senator from Iowa just stated that if the time-limit clause were removed one of the most objectionable features of the bill would be eliminated. I should like to point out to him that 15 of the most objectionable features of the bill would be eliminated, and they would be the 15 cruisers.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, does the Senator from California mean to infer that the Secretary of the Navy is opposed to the President of the United States and to the President elect with reference to this matter?

Mr. JOHNSON. I draw no inference; I was stating facts; I leave the inference to be drawn by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Do I understand the Senator from California to say that the Secretary of the Navy wants this provision as to the time limit to remain in the bill?

Mr. HALE. I do not think the Secretary of the Navy had anything to do with it. The House committee put the provision in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will say that my understanding of the fact is that the time limit was inserted in the bill at the instance and with the consent of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, the Senator from California knows now that both the President of the United States and the President elect, the leaders of his party, want to see it eliminated.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator from Montana mean to imply that I will thereby be influenced? Let me suggest to him that in the period during which I have been in the Senate and in the period during which I may remain here I act upon my own volition, and according to my own judgment, just as I assume all the other Senators do, and as I know the Senator from Montana does. Whether some individual or some official, high or low, may insist, or demand even, that this bill be of a certain character will not have the slightest influence, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. WHEELER. I am well aware of the fact that it will not, so far as the Senator from California is concerned, but there are, of course, other Members of the Senate who are constantly saying when the President makes a statement that surely it is lese majeste if we do not follow his advice and judgment in the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the President is right in a statement that he makes, I am delighted to follow him; if I believe him to be wrong, I will follow him not at all. That has been my attitude in days gone by, and that is going to be my attitude now in my old age, so long as I shall serve in this body.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I am in full accord with the statement of the senior Senator from California as to his attitude; but what about the junior Senator from California?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The junior Senator from California is able to answer for himself. I could answer in substantially the language of my colleague. I have followed the President in many cases; in quite a number I have failed to follow him. In this matter I shall pursue the course I have heretofore indicated, with the utmost respect for the present President and the President to be; and before we get through I think I can convince them that they are in error.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield for an observation?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I yield first to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I think at the outset in discussing the attitude of the President elect that we should look at the language of his telegram in a broad way and consider the position in which he was placed. He says in his telegram to the President:

> As you know, I warmly support your own views, and you may so inform others if you wish to do so.

Mr. President, the President elect is not supposed to comment on the administration in office; his term of office commences on the 4th of March, and it would ill become him to disagree publicly with the views of the present President. So I think we should view the statement of the President elect in a broad way and not expect him in a few words to discuss the various technicalities of a bill pending before the Senate. It would be an impossibility and an injustice to him to expect him to agree with everything in any bill now before the Senate. I think he has been placed in an unfortunate position, and that we should consider him as showing a proper respect for the present President.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to say that we should lay aside our own judgment in these matters, as Members of the legislative branch of the Government, and let the Executive perform our functions for us?

Mr. ODDIE. No; the Senator misconstrues my point of view. I believe that we should go forward and pass this bill as it is. I disagree with President Coolidge in this matter, and I do not believe that President-elect Hoover is voicing President Coolidge's views as to the technical points in this bill. I do not think, therefore, that President-elect Hoover's statement should deter us from passing this bill as it is.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator mean to say that he doubts the sincerity of the President elect in sending the telegram?

Mr. ODDIE. No; not at all. I have the highest regard for the ability and sincerity of President-elect Hoover, but I do not think that he should be placed in the position of going into the technical details of this bill when it is not before him at all. I think we should pass this bill as it is now framed. I think President-elect Hoover has been placed in an unfortunate position, and that we could not expect him to do otherwise than he has done.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator, does he think that the President elect agrees with President Coolidge with reference to the elimination of the time-clause limitation or does he differ from the President?

Mr. ODDIE. I think that President-elect Hoover should be taken at his word in the statement he made in his acceptance speech, which the junior Senator from California read into the RECORD the other day. President-elect Hoover believes in an adequate national defense.

Mr. WHEELER. Everybody believes in that.

Mr. ODDIE. There are different ways of stating it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I want to get the Senator's viewpoint, if the Senator from Iowa will yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California will state his point of order.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator from Iowa has the floor; the Senator from Mississippi will have his chance later on. I submit we are here to listen to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WHEELER. The trouble is the Senator from California will not listen to him.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to make certain that I understand the statement of the Senator from Nevada. Does he still doubt that President-elect Hoover is in favor of the elimination of this time-limit provision?

Mr. ODDIE. I do not think President-elect Hoover's statement should be construed as opposing the bill as it is to-day.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the way the Senator reads it, and that is his construction and interpretation?

Mr. ODDIE. My construction is that his statement is a very broad statement, and that he should not be expected to go into the technical details of this bill at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. What was his object in sending the telegram, and what does his telegram mean?

Mr. ODDIE. He was quoted as saying certain things which would appear on their face to differ with the opinion of the President.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Just what difference does it make whether a private citizen of the United States, whatever his name, agrees with the President of the United States or not?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, in answer to that——

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think the Senator from Nevada had finished answering the question.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me answer the Senator from Missouri on that point. To the Senator from Missouri it makes no difference, but to a regular Republican it makes a lot of difference; and that is why I raised the question.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, how does the Senator from Iowa happen to be speaking for regular Republicans?

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Iowa is much like the Senator from Missouri. Sometimes he speaks for them, and sometimes he speaks the other way. It happens this time that I have the task of defending the President of the United States himself and the President elect upon the question of the time limit in this cruiser bill. I agree with them that it ought to be cut out, and I am taking that side. Now, here are the regular Republicans, including even the distinguished junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], who swears by his party regularity all the time. It is his creed and his religion, and especially does he stand by the Budget, which is the keystone of Republican regularity; but he is here to-day fighting the President and fighting the President elect.

Mr. REED of Missouri and Mr. CARAWAY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Referring to what the Senator from Iowa says as to the sudden change and shift of position of the Senator from California, is it any more remarkable for the Senator from California to differ from the President and the President elect than it is for the Senator from Iowa to agree with the President and the President elect?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; it is somewhat different, because the Senator from Iowa does not sometimes even pretend to agree with the President and the President elect, but the Senator from California is a regular Republican. Do not forget that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, the people of California never have forgotten it, and I trust America will not forget it. They may forget me, but my Republican record will remain.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator from California goes on with this insurgency, he may become more popular than ever out in California.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I was going to say that the junior Senator from California, as I recall, on two different occasions gave as his reason for voting for the confirmation of certain people in open session here that he had faith in the President of the United States, and that because of the fact that he had faith and confidence in the President of the United States and that his judgment was superior he took his word and voted for the nominations on faith. I am wondering why the junior Senator from California has not the same confidence in the President of the United States at this time. Is it because of the fact that "the king is dead," and so he says, "Long live the king"?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay this very interesting speech——

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Time was when I thought this was a deliberative legislative body. I am almost convinced that it has become a mere arena for attempted wit and pleasantry. Replying to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], I have often said that I had unwavering faith in the President, and assuredly I have great faith in the President to be, if for no other reason that because he was born in Iowa, where I was born. I have never, however, admitted that there were supermen in America, nor have I ever voted for the confirmation of anyone because I said or thought that the President's view was all-controlling or his judgment "superior" to mine or to that of the Senator from Montana. But enough.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BROOKHART. Just a moment, and then I will yield. Of course, those "good old days" when we had this deliberation here seem to have been the regular Republican days, when we did not deliberate at all. Now, I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McMASTER. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending cruiser bill; and I ask that the clerk read it, and that it lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the bill the following new section:

SEC. 6. (a) Upon declaration of war by the Congress at any time hereafter, the following persons shall forthwith be drafted into the military or naval service of the United States, to serve in the zone of actual hostilities for the duration thereof:

(1) Every male person under the age of 55 years who upon such declaration of war is a Member of either House of Congress or who within one month prior to such declaration has resigned from Membership in either House.

(2) Every citizen of the United States or a possession of the United States, over the age of 30 years and under the age of 55 years, who is or at any time within one month prior to the declaration of war has been the beneficial owner of property equal in value to $5,000,000 or more.

(3) Every citizen of the United States or a possession of the United States over the age of 30 years and under the age of 55 years who is, or at any time within one month prior to the declaration of war has been a member of a partnership with total assets, including individual property of the partners liable for partnership debts, equal in value to $5,000,000 or more.

(4) The chief executive of every corporation organized within the United States and its Territories and possessions, with a subscribed capital stock and surplus of $5,000,000 or more, if such chief executive is a male citizen of the United States or a possession of the United States and under the age of 55 years, and otherwise the male citizen of the United States or a possession of the United States under the age of 55 years who is next in line of succession to the duties of the office of chief executive.

(5) The 10 other male citizens of the United States or a possession of the United States over the age of 30 years and under the age of 55 years who are the beneficial owners of the largest amounts of stock in each such corporation. If in order to define any such group of 10 stockholders it is necessary to choose between male citizens between such ages owning the same amount of stock, the choice between such individuals shall be of the youngest. Persons within this group shall be selected on the basis of stock ownership as of one month prior to the declaration of war.

(b) If any person is found to be within more than one of the classifications of subdivision (a) of this section he shall be drafted as a person within whichever one of such classifications is first enumerated in such subdivision, or, if he is within classification (4) or (5) as an officer or stockholder of more than one corporation, he shall be drafted as an officer or stockholder of the corporation of which he owns the largest amount of capital stock; and he shall be disregarded in determining the representatives of all other classifications and corporations. No person unfit to perform any service, combatant or noncombatant, shall be counted in determining representation of corporations.

(c) When after a declaration of war the value of the property of any individual or the assets of any partnership, as defined in subdivision

(a) of this section, reaches the amount of $5,000,000, such individual or the members of such partnership shall be forthwith drafted into the military or naval service of the United States. When after a declaration of war the subscribed capital stock and surplus of any corporation, organized theretofore or thereafter, reaches the amount of $5,000,000, an officer and 10 stockholders selected as in paragraphs (4) and (5) of subdivision (a) of this section, on the basis of stock ownership as of the date on which the subscribed capital stock reaches such amount, shall be forthwith drafted into the military or naval service of the United States.

(d) The President is authorized to provide by regulation for the expeditious assignment of the persons so drafted to active military or naval service within the zone of actual hostilities. Such assignment shall be to the branches and grades of the service for which such persons are qualified. All such persons shall be assigned to combatant service except those who are unfit therefor and those who are members of well-recognized religious sects or organizations the existing creeds and principles of which forbid their members to participate in war, and whose convictions are in accord with such creeds and principles; but no person shall be exempted from noncombatant service for any disability or other reason if he can consistently with the interests of the service be employed in any capacity with the military or naval forces in the zone of actual hostilities. No person shall be discharged from service under this section prior to the cessation of actual hostilities except for disability to perform any service under this section.

(e) Persons subject to the provisions of this section who are in the military or naval service of the United States shall be counted in determining the membership of the classes subject to this section and shall continue in such service but shall be assigned to active duty in the zone of actual hostilities at the earliest possible moment, and shall not be discharged or retired from active service prior to the cessation of hostilities except for disability to perform any service.

(f) It is declared to be the policy of the Congress that every Member of either House drafted into the military or naval service under this section shall immediately resign his office of Senator or Representative. No Member so drafted shall receive any compensation for his services as Member for the remainder of his term.

(g) The President is authorized to provide by regulation for the ascertainment of persons subject to this section and for the execution of all provisions of this section.

(h) Any person violating any regulation made in pursuance of this section or attempting in any way to evade service or to aid any other person to evade service under this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 and by imprisonment for not more than five years nor less than three years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I listened to the reading of that amendment with a great deal of interest. I wonder if the Senator intends to send these Congressmen and Senators into these cruisers?

Mr. McMASTER. I understand that if we have 15 cruisers, they will have room to take care of a few of them.

Mr. BROOKHART. Have you any good safe place where you can keep the cruisers?

Mr. McMASTER. I can not say as to that.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, as I have scanned the history of human civilization it has a record of going back something like 6,000 years; and yet, after that 6,000 years of advancement and experience, after 6,000 years of recorded history, in which the human race is supposed to have built up a better and higher civilization, the final result of that civilization was the World War.

The World War is the great accomplishment of human civilization up to this date and, if we survey that achievement, we find its balance sheet is in the red. It will take two generations to pay off the debts and the obligations of that war. Therefore up to date, from an economic standpoint, at least, human civilization is a failure.

There has resulted since that war a movement to change the policy, to change the basic thought of the world so that our next great world achievement might be something different from war.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYDINGS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator speaks about changing the basic thought of the world. What does he mean by that? What is the basic thought of Italy, with her great standing army? What is the basic thought of England, with her great navy?

Mr. BROOKHART. I mean what the Senator voted for the other day, very much to my surprise, the universal outlawry of war in the world.

Mr. REED of Missouri. No; I did not vote for anything of the kind. I voted for the treaty after we got through a reservation, or what amounted to a reservation, which took the danger out of it, and left it nothing but a mere expression of good will. I will say to the Senator in perfect confidence that I would not have cast that vote for a proposition which I considered idiotic if I had not said that I would do so in order to get through the reservation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. If the Senator cares to answer the Senator from Missouri, doubtless he could answer him better than I can; however, I would answer the Senator from Missouri by saying that in my opinion, judging from expressions from almost every country, the basic thought of the people of the world is a desire for peace, for opportunity to work out their destinies free from the menace and specter of war. I believe that any movement in the interest of world peace, whether through disarmament or through multilateral treaties or otherwise, would command the sincere support of the peoples of the world, particularly those who profess the Christian religion. I fear, however, that there are symptoms of militarism in the United States to-day, and any repercussions here will have reactions beyond the seas. In my opinion, the people of Italy and France, to whom the Senator has referred, desire peace. The people of Russia want peace.

Of course, there are those in every country who are willing to follow in the paths of the past, who look upon war, hateful as it is, as a heritage or evil from which humanity can not escape. They too often employ the same arguments in its defense that have been presented by militarists in all ages, and most of them urge "preparedness" as a preventive of war. "Preparedness" to some means large appropriations for military armaments and for the building of huge navies.

In the view of some peace is not long to be enjoyed by any generation, and nations must so conduct themselves as to ever be prepared for war. The thesis seems to be, let all nations arm to the teeth as a means to secure peace! That implies the greater the "preparedness" the greater the assurance of peace. This fallacy would make of the world an armed camp.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It is certainly refreshing to find one or two gentlemen who can speak for the entire world. Heretofore the spokesmen have generally confined themselves to certain classes of people whom they especially represent. Nobody will dispute that every individual in the world would like to have peace, but that is not the question we are discussing. We are discussing the question of whether the United States shall remain hopeless and helpless in the face of the vast armaments that are being created; and when we look to the official dispositions of nations it is well to look at the preparations they are making for war.

Mr. BROOKHART. In answer to that direct proposition, I would say to the Senator from Missouri that if we build 15 cruisers, or 30 cruisers, or 100, we will be just as helpless after they are built as we were before. Their value is nothing in warfare, and one of the most distinguished admirals of our Navy said that the only safe place for them in war time would be as far up the Mississippi River as you could get them. If you got them as far up as Missouri, that would make them fairly safe.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, the Senator undertakes to quote one unnamed admiral. The Senator knows that the authorities of the Army and of the Navy are practically a unit for this bill, and that the opinion that some gentlemen have, or some 1 or 2 or 3 or 4 men may have, that ships of war are obsolete, is not the opinion of the men who have studied the problem throughout the world. It is not the opinion of Great Britain, or of Japan, or of Italy, or of any of the other nations which are expending vast sums of money to build fleets of war. If it were their opinion, they would not be building. So it is useless to talk about what some one man said.

Of course, the Senator himself, who was a good soldier and made an admirable record, is entitled to his view; but when any statement is made on the floor of the Senate that war vessels are useless, I put against the Senator's opinion the opinion of the military experts of the entire earth—with two or three exceptions of men who have gone wild on the question of airplanes.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I have consulted some of the military authorities myself, the highest and best men we have, and I am not speaking without reason when I say that these ships will be junk from the moment they are launched, and be of little or no value in case of war. If the Senator from Missouri were President of the United States and we should get into a war with Great Britain—of course, these ships are built against Great Britain, and no other nation—the Senator himself can not point out to me any safe place where he could send them to fight Great Britain right now.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, there is never a safe place when you are fighting Great Britain. It is always unsafe.

Mr. BROOKHART. There would not be a fighting chance any place the Senator could send them.

Mr. REED of Missouri. We would certainly be safer if we had more of them than Great Britain had than if we had less than Great Britain had.

Mr. BROOKHART. If Great Britain had not one of them afloat and we had a hundred, I still say we would not dare send them against Great Britain.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Iowa referred to an admiral who stated in substance that in the event of war, because of the submarines and aircraft, the American fleet, particularly the battleships, would be unsafe unless they were up the Mississippi River. As I recall, a statement similar to this was made by one of our most distinguished admirals, Admiral Sims, who rendered excellent service during the war, and who is competent to speak. My memory may be at fault and it may have been Admiral Fullam. Many eminent naval writers and experts take the position that battleships and cruisers have lost their importance. Lord Fisher, one of the great naval experts, referred to the new agencies of naval warfare—the submarine and the airplane—and added that because of these forces he emphasized that the navy should be scrapped. Admiral von Scheer, who commanded the German fleet at the Battle of Jutland, referred to the submarines and torpedoes and said that the German submarines taught the world a lesson, and that the Battle of Jutland and the naval engagement on August 19, when two cruisers were sunk, changed the whole course of the naval campaign.

He also stated that the greatest naval fleet can not protect commerce against submarines. The German fleet at the Battle of Jutland was greatly inferior to the British Grand Fleet, and yet, as I read the account of the contest, the victory was gained by the German fleet. As I recall the facts, the fleet under Admiral Beatty was severely punished, a number of the battle cruisers and other fighting craft being destroyed. And Admiral Jellicoe felt constrained to retire because of the danger to the battleships from submarines. We all know that the British grand fleet sought refuge in Scapa Flow during the great part of the war. Upon a few occasions, when there was an intimation that a submarine had penetrated the harbor, the fleet fled to escape the submarine. The German fleet, during substantially the entire period of the war, was safely ensconced in German harbors.

We know that 24 submarines—and that is all that Germany had at any one time traversing the seas—came very nearly winning the war. They destroyed scores of war vessels belonging to the allied powers, and sunk more than 20,000,000 tons of shipping. It has been said by some naval writers that if Germany had had 200 submarines when the war commenced she probably would have won the war.

The trouble with some naval officers is that they are reactionary and adhere to archaic plans. In my opinion, that was the case with British as well as American naval experts prior to and following the World War. Many of them ignored the lessons of the war and failed to recognize the importance of submarines and airplanes. They still regard the battleship as the foundation and the capstone of the Navy, and sought to impose enormous burdens upon the people in the construction of battle fleets.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think I concur with most of what the Senator has said.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong this debate on the side, but I think the world has had some new history given to it this morning.

Mr. KING. I am glad the Senator has learned something.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I think the news that the British fleet ran and that the German fleet stayed there is a bit of history that at least is unique. The fact about the matter is, as all of the records of the time show, that the German fleet put up a magnificent fight, under advantageous conditions, and then before the British battle fleet could be fully massed against it the German fleet retired. But again, we have Admiral Sims quoted, one man against the united judgment of the military experts of the world.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. Just a moment. I would not consider Admiral Sims's mere opinion, but the reasons he advances have very great weight, and they outweigh the reactionary sentiment of experts on military affairs very greatly, in my judgment. That is why I give weight to them. The fleet ran away and hid all the time during the World War because it did not dare get out and face even the little submarines or even the air forces of that time. Now, with the submarines so greatly improved, and with the air equipment perhaps a hundred times as efficient as at the beginning of the World War, there is no place left in warfare for these big ships, any more than there is for King Arthur's armor.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then, will the Senator tell us why Great Britain is so reluctant to limit them?

Mr. BROOKHART. The same reactionary military idea is ruling Great Britain that is ruling us in this country. I am familiar with it through and through. They are not looking forward to the developments since the war, but they are relying on old traditions, that have blown up and will disappear entirely when the next war comes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. And so with France?

Mr. BROOKHART. France is using more sense.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. They have authorized the building of cruisers since the Kellogg treaty was signed.

Mr. BROOKHART. They are building cruisers, but they are building a good many more submarines, and the submarine has some more efficiency left in it.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I would like to ask if the Senator from Iowa does not think there are a lot of naval officers over in Great Britain, the same as there are here, who want some nice cruiser or battleship to sail on?

Mr. BROOKHART. A good many more, proportionately, than we have in the United States.

Mr. President, I had reached the point where I had said there is a change in the basic thought of the world. I would not say a change in the basic desire of the world. I agree that the desire of all sensible people always has been for peace.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator has said that the American people have always been for peace. It does not make any difference what the people are for when the Government makes the decision. Experience shows that it is not what the country is for, but that very often we get into war on other grounds than the things that are discussed here. If we have loans to protect, history shows we have gone to war to protect those loans.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota be good enough to name any one war we ever engaged in which we entered into to "enforce loans"?

Mr. BROOKHART. The World War, largely.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Not at all.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of course, that may be a matter of opinion. I am informed, I think reliably, that when we went into the last war there was $5,000,000,000 of foreign paper in the 30,000 banks of the United States.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator must recall we never declared war upon any nation. The resolution which passed the Senate did not declare war against Germany. It declared that war existed which had been made upon us.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And we did not enter into that war in order to enforce any claim that we had, or to secure any outstanding debt due us. I regret exceedingly to hear a Senator of the United States say, and have his words to go into the RECORD of this body, that his Nation and my Nation entered into any war in order to enforce a monetary demand.

Mr. BROOKHART. There were some strong indications down in Haiti and Nicaragua and other little places where we have been conducting one-horse wars.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does the Senator from Iowa stand by the proposition that our country has entered into any war for monetary reasons? I put it broadly. I do not stand for any such proposition.

Mr. BROOKHART. We have entered into transactions that I would call war. I do not know whether the Senator would call them war or not.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, in view of what the Senator from California has said——

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of course, when I said what I did I had reference to the economic conditions which lead to a war. The overt act may not be the real cause of the war. The declaration of war may not be the real cause of the war. We are talking about the causes for nations entering upon war.

In the debate yesterday it was clearly brought out in the very able speech of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that at the outbreak of the World War we did not maintain our neutrality or enforce our rights as neutrals against Great Britain.

Because we permitted Great Britain to put food on the contraband list was given at least as one of the reasons why the German Government opened up its indiscriminate submarine warfare. That was also a violation of international law, and I believe to be the overt act that finally got us into the war. However, the debate also disclosed the fact that we had loans of vast sums of money to European governments and allied governments. Bankers here were the financial agents of the allied governments, and the fact that we had so much paper in our banks possibly had something to do, it was admitted in debate yesterday, with the failure of our Government to maintain our neutrality, to enforce our rights at sea.

In the debate yesterday I happened to refer to a letter that was written by the American ambassador to President Wilson. It was written a month before we went into the war. I was speaking from memory, and because so many Senators expressed surprise that such a letter should have been written, and because several Senators came to me afterwards on the floor and asked me confidentially if I had such a letter, I have brought it with me to-day. In view of what has taken place here, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I would like to read at least a portion of that letter.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Before the Senator does that let me say I referred to the remark the Senator made that we had gone to war to "enforce loans." I am listening to his explanatory remarks, and hereafter, if it should be proper, I shall express myself as to the immediate matter; but, not to further detain the Senator——

Mr. BROOKHART. I am glad to yield in any reasonable degree to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I very earnestly deny that the United States of America has ever gone to war against any nation of this earth to enforce a monetary demand.

Mr. BROOKHART. It was an economic demand. I think the Mexican War can not be justified. I stand with Abraham Lincoln on that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Do not quote or forget the fate of Tom Corwin on that subject. The Senator remembers what happened to him?

Mr. BROOKHART. Abraham Lincoln is a higher authority than Tom Corwin. I do not go any higher than that myself.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of course, the act of Congress that took us into the war was based on the fact that war existed at the time, and I think that is true.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he goes further?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator spoke of a letter yesterday. I was surprised, and I would like to know where the letter is to be found. Has the Senator a copy of it?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I have it here.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator proposes to read it now. Where can it be found?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have it here in volume 2 of the Life and Letters of Walter H. Page, published by Doubleday, Page & Co. I find on page 269 a letter dated March 5, 1917, by the American ambassador to Great Britain, Mr. Page, written to Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, and reading as follows:

MARCH 5, 1917.

To the PRESIDENT:

The inquiries which I have made here about financial conditions disclose an international situation which is most alarming to the financial and industrial outlook of the United States. England has not only to pay her own war bills, but is obliged to finance her allies as well. Up to the present time she has done these tasks out of her own capital. But she can not continue her present extensive purchases in the United States without shipping gold as payment for them, and there are two reasons why she can not make large shipments of gold. In the first place, both England and France must keep the larger part of the gold they have to maintain issues of their paper at par; and, in the second place, the German U-boat has made the shipping of gold a dangerous procedure even if they had it to ship. There is, therefore, a pressing danger that the Franco-American and Anglo-American exchange will be greatly disturbed; the inevitable consequence will be that orders by all the allied governments will be reduced to the lowest possible amount and that trans-Atlantic trade will practically come to an end. The result of such a stoppage will be a panic in the United States. The world will, therefore, be divided into two hemispheres, one of them, our own, will have the gold and the commodities; the other, Great Britain and Europe, will need these commodities, but it will have no money with which to pay for them. Moreover, it will have practically no commodities of its own to exchange for them. The financial and commercial result will be almost as bad for the United States as for Europe. We shall soon reach this condition unless we take quick action to prevent it. Great Britain and France must have a credit in the United States which will be large enough to prevent the collapse of world trade and the whole financial structure of Europe.

If the United States should declare war against Germany the greatest help we could give Great Britain and its allies would be such a credit. If we should adopt this policy an excellent plan would be for our Government to make a large investment in a Franco-British loan. Another plan would be to guarantee such a loan. A great advantage would be that all the money would be kept in the United States. We could keep on with our trade and increase it till the war ends, and after the war Europe would purchase food and an enormous supply of materials with which to reequip her peace industries. We should thus reap the profit of an uninterrupted and perhaps an enlarging trade over a number of years and we should hold their securities in payment.

On the other hand, if we keep nearly all the gold and Europe can not pay for reestablishing its economic life, there may be a world-wide panic for an indefinite period.

Of course, we can not extend such a credit unless we go to war with Germany, but is there no way in which our Government might immediately and indirectly help the establishment in the United States of a large Franco-British credit, without violating armed neutrality? I do not know enough about our own reserve bank law to form an opinion. But these banks would avert such a danger if they were able to establish such a credit. Danger for us is more real and imminent, I think, than the public on either side of the Atlantic understands. If it be not averted before its manifestations become apparent, it will then be too late to save the day.

The pressure of this approaching crisis, I am certain, has gone beyond the ability of the Morgan financial agency for the British and French Governments. The financial necessities of the Allies are too great and urgent for any private agency to handle, for every such agency has to encounter business rivalries and sectional antagonisms.

It is not improbable that the only way of maintaining our present preeminent trade position and averting a panic is by declaring war on Germany. The submarine has added the last item to the danger of a financial world crash. There is now an uncertainty about our being drawn into the war; no more considerable credit can be privately placed in the United States. In the meantime a collapse may come.

PAGE.

The statement I made yesterday——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator was reading from Mr. Page's letter?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes. That letter was sent by Mr. Page to the President of the United States.

Mr. BROOKHART. Before I conclude I shall read a letter from Sir George Paish about present conditions that corroborates that letter in a very strong degree.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota was going to refer to his own statement. He ought to finish that reference. The Senator said that war came about for the protection of Morgan & Co.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I referred to this letter and said the American ambassador had written a letter to the President of the United States before we were in the war, saying that he knew that the financing of the loans had now become too much of a burden for the private financial agencies of the French and the British Governments, Morgan & Co., and that, in his opinion, the Government of the United States would have to do it, and the only way they could do it, in his opinion, was to declare war on Germany. The letter I have read speaks for itself. He said the only way we could hold our preeminent trade position was to declare war on Germany.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What reply did President Wilson make, if any, to that letter?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There is nothing here to show that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Is the Senator contending that President Wilson was moved to act by virtue of that letter from our ambassador?

Mr. BROOKHART. President Wilson had some high ideals about the World War, and I myself give him full credit for them.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I said that the act declaring war was a declaration that war existed, and I think that war did exist at that time. I did not mean to say that what I have suggested was the direct reason given for Congress passing the act declaring that war was existing at the time. I pointed to it, as I believe it to be, one of the economic reasons that had its influence in preventing the Government of the United States from enforcing its rights at sea in the beginning of the World War. This failure, I believe, ultimately influenced conditions upon which we later entered the war.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator does not mean to say now that we went to war to enforce a given loan or to insist upon the payment of sums of money due us?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly I would not make such a statement or such a charge, that we went to war to collect a loan, though that may have had, and I think it did have, a great deal to do with finally bringing us into the war.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator, however, did make such a remark in his earlier brief statement, but I see he has qualified it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think it would not be fair to say that the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota presented that circumstance as the sole cause of the war.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; I did not mean to give that impression; I mentioned it for what it was worth as indicating one of the economic causes that brought us into the war.

The Senator from California is familiar with the statements that have been made recently by British statesmen as well as by statesmen of the Central Powers of Europe and others in the United States and Canada, that there was a background of economic influences in all countries that led up to and caused the great World War. They were found in all countries, and influenced all the chancelleries of Europe. I think it is fair to assume that they, more or less, influenced our Government, and certainly, after reading this and other correspondence of the American ambassador to Great Britain, I can not help but come to the conclusion that he did not represent his Government with the fidelity that I should like to have seen him represent it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think that letter affords very great enlightenment to the pathway of this discussion. I myself do not think that wars are caused solely by economic reasons, and yet the history of every war that I have analyzed shows economic oppression on one side or the other.

We can begin with our own Revolutionary War. The cause, so far as the American people were concerned, was the desire of political freedom, but that political freedom had been denied to them because of the economic desires of the mother country. Economic autocracy always is the most dangerous form of oppression. The American Colonies rose in revolution to obtain economic equality, to establish the great principle that all men are created equal and that all governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed. So far as the American people are concerned, I think that ideal governed them in that war 100 per cent. So far as those on the other side of the controversy were concerned, they were actuated by a desire to protect their loans, if that comparison may be used; in other words, they were actuated by a desire to protect their economic advantage over the people of the Colonies.

Our next war was the War of 1812. That was a war for the freedom of the seas, and I think very largely that was the ideal which governed the American people. Nevertheless, the idea that we had licked England and we could do it again had some effect on our action, and such an idea could hardly be placed on the high level as the desire to secure the freedom of the seas.

Our next war was the Mexican War. Again we had an ideal. The American people can not be induced to go into war unless they are convinced that there is some great purpose to be accomplished. Rightly or wrongly, they must be so convinced before they will consent to a war. Of course, the idea that convinced them in that case was the freedom of the little Republic of Texas. Personally, I think that was rather a subterfuge than a real, genuine cause. I am certainly in accord with Abraham Lincoln in his summary of the causes of the Mexican War, and I think that is one war in which we were in the wrong. We had no justification based upon the real high ideals of Americanism for engaging in that war. Texas could have been freed just as well without that war as with it.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. Does the Senator recall the substance of the statement which President Lincoln made in regard to the Mexican War?

Mr. BROOKHART. Oh, yes; I mentioned that, but I can not at this moment quote Mr. Lincoln's exact language.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, doubtless the Senator from Iowa remembers that that statement was made in what was characterized as the "Spot" speech of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think that is correct; but there is no doubt about his having made the statement, and there is no doubt about Mr. Lincoln's idea in reference to the Mexican War.

Next we came to the Spanish-American War, and again we found a people in revolution as we ourselves had been in revolution against England. That revolution had reached such a stage that we finally decided that we were justified in assisting in it, even as the French had assisted us in our revolution against Great Britain. I think that was a cause consistent with American ideals, and upon that basis the American people heartily approved that war.

Our Civil War, which preceded the Spanish-American War, grew out of economic considerations without any doubt. The Declaration of Independence had proclaimed the equality of men. That meant economic equality as well as personal equality. All men can not be created equal if they are not created with equal economic opportunity. That high ideal was written into the Declaration of Independence. It is the beginning of Americanism; it is the end of Americanism. Americanism is found in that great document—the greatest document of human rights ever produced in all this world. But after we had fought for seven years upon the ideals of the Declaration of Independence and had finally, with the aid of France, triumphed in the Revolution, then came the time that we must set up a government on our own account and affirmatively translate those principles into a constitution and into law. During those seven years we had drifted along without government, almost in chaos, as it were. Then the Constitutional Convention met. That convention reacted a long way from the high ideals of the Declaration of Independence. That convention finally agreed upon a constitution that recognized and established human slavery. There is no greater economic or political crime against the Declaration of Independence than the language of servitude which was written into the Constitution of the United States. It took us 75 years of time, a million men, and billions of money finally to remove that political crime from our Constitution.

The people of the South went into that war in spite of the fact that they were defending slavery on the basis of what were considered ideals. They were as honest in adhering to those ideals as were we in the North, but, of course, those ideals when considered after the lapse of time, that takes away prejudice, will not stand analysis as compared to the ideals of the North; and I think everybody in the United States is now glad that the institution of slavery is ended forever.

Our last war had its economic causes; economic questions were raised, as the Senator from Minnesota has pointed out; but I want to give President Wilson credit—and I have given him credit in all cases when I have spoken on the subject—of having great American ideals upon which he acted. It reached the stage where he said it was necessary for us to enter the war in order to make the world safe for democracy, to end wars. Those were great ideals which the American people generally understood and which led them to approve the action of the Government of the United States. Even the German-American portion of our population approved those great ideals. I do not for one moment believe that the American people ever had a thought of enmity against the German people; their thought was against the autocratic government and power that ruled Germany. I have said heretofore, and I repeat, that the greatest act of Woodrow Wilson, in my opinion, was at the end of the war when he called upon the people of Germany to rise in revolution and establish a government with which we could treat. That government has been established; it certainly has my good wishes and my hope for its permanent endurance; and I think that the fiasco of the seventieth birthday celebration of the former Kaiser the other day is conclusive proof that his autocratic power is gone forever.

Following the late war, and even during the war, Woodrow Wilson presented to the Congress of the United States his 14 points of peace. I have here the record of his speech. I may read it before I get through, but not at this time. Those 14 points of peace were a great American ideal based upon this new thought for the outlawry of war. That is the landmark in the history of the world when we start toward ending war as a governmental process in the settlement of disputes.

Wilson was not able, in the treaty of Versailles, to establish all of his 14 points of peace. When I was in Germany, with a good deal of justice, many said to me, "You promised us 14 points and gave us 4." Perhaps that is a little strong; but that was not Wilson's fault. He nevertheless had his ideal, and he did his best to put that ideal into the treaty of peace itself.

Failure is not always a detraction from greatness or from the greatness of an ideal. I think the amendments to the Constitution of the United States are the greatest part of it.

The first series of amendments belonged to Thomas Jefferson and to his ideal, and his era, the Bill of Rights. The next series of amendments belonged to Abraham Lincoln and his ideals. The last series of amendments, which gave us the income-tax amendment and the direct election of United States Senators, the suffrage for women, and prohibition, belonged to the statesmanship and the ideals of William J. Bryan.

Although Bryan never was President of the United States, he must rank in the highest place among the statesmen of our country for the ideals that he had, and for the success that they finally obtained in the Constitution of the United States itself.

And so with Woodrow Wilson in reference to his 14 points. They are not yet in the League of Nations; they are not in the World Court; but this treaty that we ratified the other day for the outlawry of war is the first great step to give them effect in international relations, and there is hope that the ages will finally ratify, even to the limit, these great ideals of peace.

Why did Wilson fail? It was because the economic organization of the world was wrong. It was because the world is organized on a basis of war, both as between individuals and nations and also as between affairs of business.

I do not believe we can ever reach a stage of world peace on the competitive theory of business affairs which we are following in this world. I believe we shall have to adopt a different system, and I have detailed ideas of what that system should be. In fact, it is growing; it is building itself slowly but surely and completely the world around. I have quoted in this Chamber the fact that 92 per cent of American business ultimately fails. Those are the figures of former Senator Pepper; and former Senator Harreld, an expert upon that subject, put the statement in the RECORD, in a speech on this floor, that 96 per cent ultimately fails. Now, think of an economic organization in the world that is based upon that great percentage of failure; and yet it is as hard to get our business men to review that system, and to consider a measure of change or relief from it, as it is to get our reactionary navy men to see that the days of the big warship are over.

Economic affairs, as I have pointed out, were on one side or the other of all these wars, and they are going to be in the future; and economic affairs, I think, are more behind this cruiser bill than any other proposition.

The hearings on this bill show plainly that the principal supporters of it in the committee were the shipbuilders. They were all on hand, and they were all patriotic for the profits of building these ships.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]—I regret that he is not here, because I want to ask him a few more questions about it—said, I believe, that we had some 22 shipyards, and that over half of them were idle, and that one of the purposes of this bill was to give employment in those shipyards and bring back the prosperity of these millionaires who are now losing some money because their shipyards are not busy.

In the United States we have grown so accustomed to bringing in the Treasury and the Government to back up big business in that way that that argument passed over almost unnoticed. Here we were since 1920 with a million and a half farmers in the United States who have gone into bankruptcy as a result of economic discrimination, but nobody, even in the most radical farm bill, has ever proposed to come to the relief of those identical farmers; and yet it is all right to spend $300,000,000 of the Government's money to rehabilitate this business that has already made a large flock of millionaires!

I think that is the trouble about this bill. Here is the President of the United States willing to take out this time limit and then secure an international agreement that will make these ships unnecessary; but these shipbuilders and shipyards want no such American idea as that to prevail. They want the profits.

The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] asked me what I meant by "profiteering"; and he seemed to have the idea that if a private shipyard could build these ships at a cheaper figure than the navy yards, that was not profiteering. But here are these private yards in distress now. Any kind of a measure that will keep the yards running will mean an immense profit for the owners of those yards.

The Government is in no way to blame for their being in distress. Under the competitive rule of business they have arrived there, just as almost all competitive business ultimately does arrive. Therefore, they have no claim upon the Treasury of the United States to be rehabilitated. Nevertheless, their representatives appeared in these hearings, dominated the hearings, and have then been commended on the ground that one of the patriotic purposes of this bill is to rehabilitate and build up their business that has broken down on its own account.

If we are to outlaw war, we must first take the profits out of war. I am opposed to war profiteering in any degree in time of war, and I am just as strongly opposed to any private person making profits out of preparation for war. Everybody has conceded that the first proposition is right. I have heard every class of statesman and every class of people in our country say that we must stop profiteering in the next war. Even profiteers join in that talk, because there is no argument against it; but they are alert and shrewd and keen toward developing a situation that will continue their profits.

The American Legion many years ago passed a resolution against war profiteering, and it passed a resolution for the drafting of capital on the same terms as men; but there is something wrong in the upper story of the American Legion on that proposition. The rank and file of the American Legion are against war just as much as I am against war. Of the 800,000 members of the Legion, three-fourths would vote against this cruiser bill if the facts were laid before them. I have tested the matter out in my own State, and I am certain that that is true. Of the other soldiers about three and a half million are not in the Legion, and this is more emphatically true of them; yet the leaders of the Legion indorse these bloodthirsty measures backing profiteering.

I am going to offer an amendment, before I conclude, to build all of these ships in the Government yards, and end all of this chance at saving private profiteers in their private business.

If that amendment were adopted, I think this bill would collapse at once. Most of its patriotic supporters would disappear right away because their opportunities, their economic opportunities, would be gone at that minute.

Now I want to meet the American Legion leaders upon this proposition. I am a member of the Legion, I have a right to criticize it, and I mean to do so. Let us discuss for a moment the draft proposition. After the convention had declared for drafting capital on the same terms as men were to be drafted, the committee of the Legion brought in a bill and had it introduced, and it finally got around to the Committee on Military Affairs. That bill provided for the most drastic methods of drafting men. The first bill even gave the President power to draft them before war was declared, although the sole power of declaring war is in the Congress. It fixed up an arrangement to catch the slackers in every way, but when it got down to drafting capital, there was no such word as "draft" there. It would "stabilize" capital, of course, on a cost-plus plan.

The sponsors of that bill, as they came before the committee in the hearing were, first, a great Wall Street speculator, and, second, a great president of a great railroad. That bill does not in any way meet the ideals of the membership of the American Legion on this subject of drafting capital. In fact, it suppresses those ideas.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think that it will ever be possible to draft capital without a constitutional amendment?

Mr. BROOKHART. These great financial magnates who appeared before the committee presented the idea that you can not draft capital, that it runs away and hides, and you get nothing. My answer to them was, "You propose the most drastic measures for catching slackers among men, and then want to legalize slackers of capital." Capital can be drafted under the Constitution by recourse to the taxing powers given Congress in that instrument. I think I can explain to the Senator a reasonable basis for drafting capital and a reasonable way by which to accomplish it.

Since 1912 the American people have been producing wealth to the extent of 5½ per cent per year. That is the most important economic fact for a Member of the Senate to know and to consider when we are passing tariff laws, when we are passing railroad laws, when we are passing farm laws, when we are passing any sort of an economic law in Congress. Yet we never hear about it. Those are Mr. Hoover's figures; so my friends, the regulars, will not dispute their authenticity. I do not believe even the Democrats will, after what happened in November.

Five and one-half per cent since 1912 is all that has come into the American pool. That is all the new wealth we have added, with all the earnings of all capital, all the earnings of all labor, all increases in property value, and, finally, all depreciation of the dollar added in.

The junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], who, as we all know, is a wizard in such matters, went clear back to the Declaration of Independence, and figured the proposition clear through, down to date; he added up the values of all the new territory, including the Louisiana Purchase out west of the Mississippi River, the purchase of Florida from Spain, the Southwestern States, which we took from Mexico, and Alaska, which we got from Russia. He added in the value of all the new cities and buildings that were erected everywhere, he added in every dollar of wealth production in the history of our country, and prior to 1912 it averaged a little less than 4 per cent a year.

That means that if we give to capital all there is in this American pool, if we give capital a return of all our wealth production and distribute it evenly, the figures will show it got only 5½ per cent since 1912.

Now we come to drafting capital for war. We draft men, first, on what terms? The distinguished financiers who appeared before our committee admitted it was less than half or a third of what they earned, on an average, in peace time. If we are to draft capital upon the same terms, we will draft capital, then, on a third of what it can earn in peace times. If we give to capital all that is earned by labor, the unearned increment, the increase in property values and depreciation of the dollar—everything—we would then have to figure a third of 5½ per cent as the rate at which capital should be drafted.

I do not think that capital is entitled to all that is produced in the country. I think some share should go to labor, management, and the inventions of genius. But I am making this argument as though it were entitled to all. Therefore this draft law should take capital and take all of the profits above—we will say a third of 5½ per cent—as a tax to support the war. That is the way capital can be drafted under the Constitution of the United States. It is just as easy to do that as it is to draft soldiers under the Constitution of the United States.

The draft bill did not go through. I had a controversy over it in the last State convention out in my State, and its main sponsor was there. But the convention did not indorse it. Its supporters did not dare bring it up for indorsement, even, before that delegate convention—and the delegate conventions rarely ever really represent the sentiment of the common soldier. He would be much more in favor of drafting capital on the same terms as men than would be the leaders who show up in the conventions.

In fact, it has been my experience with conventions of every kind that they are usually organized to thwart the sentiment and the will of the common run of people. But the bill was not indorsed. It was sent back for study and for consultation and conference with the labor organizations. I am glad to note that the chairman of our Military Affairs Committee has announced that a resolution would be presented and that we would have a commission now to investigate that matter.

The rank and file of the American Legion are absolutely sound upon these questions all the time, they are never influenced by the profiteers; but the leaders of the Legion are often too much under that influence. They failed in their intent to put through this universal draft bill upon the people of the United States.

Now they come in, and against the wish of the President of the United States and the President elect of the United States, they insist that these cruisers be built, and built now. The most blood-thirsty declaration of all comes from the American Legion. They are just as far wrong as they were upon the universal draft bill. I refuse to follow a leadership that does not consult the real interests and the real sentiment of the rank and file that compose that greatest American organization.

Mr. President, at this time I desire to offer an amendment and have it printed and lie upon the table. I would like also to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 5, after the words "and provided further," strike out the remainder of the sentence and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That all of the cruisers provided for in paragraph (a) of this section, and also the aircraft carrier provided for in paragraph (b), together with their main engines, armor and armament, shall be constructed or manufactured in the Government navy yards, naval gun factories, naval ordnance plants, or arsenals of the United States, together with their main engines, armor and armament, except such materials or parts as are not customarily manufactured in such Government plants.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie upon the table.

(At this point Mr. BROOKHART yielded to Mr. HEFLIN to suggest the absence of a quorum, and the roll was called.)

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I wish briefly to discuss the situation in reference to the multilateral treaty. I regret that I am unable to agree with the distinguished senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] upon that question. I think the multilateral treaty should be considered upon its real merits. I think it should be credited with its real virtues. I think it is worse than mockery for a great Government like the United States to adopt a peace treaty and then immediately, as the next business before its legislative body, to adopt a system which would nullify that treaty.

The outlawry of war is the starting point in disarmament, and if war is illegal and we are not to resort to war to settle our international disputes, then it is logical that we should reduce and abolish armament for war purposes. As soon as we have decided to stand upon that ground, then there will be no occasion for further appropriations for war.

I do not agree with the technical arguments that it is not preparing for war when we build a great fleet under the pretext of protecting our commerce. I think it is a preparation for war itself when we have denounced and condemned war by the peace treaty. In that view it seems to me the world would be justified in looking upon us as insincere if we immediately follow that declaration with the building of 15 great cruisers.

I have observed some of the comments upon the proposition from abroad and I think they are quite universally in accord with the observations I have made.

In this connection I have an article by J. Ramsay MacDonald, the former Prime Minister of Great Britain, entitled "America and England," which I will read, as follows:

LONDON, January 10.

The relations between the United States and Great Britain grow increasingly unhappy. The usual committees of friendship are being formed—always an ominous sign—and the usual signals of a faith in doubt are being flown, such as: "War between the United States and Great Britain is unthinkable." When I hear that I am reminded of the sailor who in dire peril expressed a thankfulness that his religion was still left. The plain fact is that a spirit is growing up in the two countries which is estranging them and is encouraging a kind of squabbling criticism which destroys mutual understanding and forbearance. It is very curious that the behavior of young creatures in nurseries so often illustrates that of nations toward each other. What each of our nations requires at this moment is a good, robust call from manly common sense.

One type of mind is peculiarly pernicious in such circumstances, that of the apostle of the inevitable. It has an alluring air of detachment and yet of stoical submission to the decrees of Providence. To-day it murmurs as in a drowsy trance that great economic empires have always clashed and fought, that capitalist competition has always brought armaments competition, and that that in turn has always brought war. Therefore all that the United States and ourselves can do is to go on temporarily with our struggle for markets and rivalry for possession of furniture and old masters, and wait for the inevitable clash and crash decreed since the beginning of the world. Against this superstition and misreading of history every backboned sentiment of morality and common sense must be up in arms. Given governments which have minds to form rational policies and a public opinion which represents an active will and is not merely a spill drifting upon the currents, war is no more inevitable than the smallpox, and the causes of war are just as controllable as insanitary conditions.

The European war left for the United States and England times full of petty irritation. The burdens of debt, revolutions in industry and in world markets, the problems of political readjustment in a world which has undergone more change than people really imagine, and, in some respects, the even more difficult mental readjustments that are called for, are not good for an equable temper. And when we come down to actual business we find ourselves still more immersed in the strangeness of the change which has taken place. The whole world to-day is calling for peace and security against war, and when a simple declaration against war which avoids every practical difficulty is put before the world, the world hails it with acclamation, signs it—and relapses. To those of us who believe that to bring the nations out of the war age is the divine task of this generation, the temptation to lapse into cynicism rather than continue in an energetic faith is very great when we find that armament expansion both in Europe and America has been decreed by the same hands and the same pens as signed a solemn bond to eliminate forever the consideration of war from national policies. There is something wrong somewhere. Somehow, the distinction in Christian conduct between Sunday and the rest of the week seems to be creeping into international policies.

The first reflection which we are apt to make on such a situation is that some nation other than our own is perfidious. That has the demerit of leading us nowhere except up the dangerous way of self-appreciation, and it also happens to be inadequate as an explanation. The fact is that every nation is rent between two opposing and hostile moods. Everyone wants peace, but no one will accept and pursue a policy based upon peace assumptions. The practical policy of the United States and Great Britain is exactly the same as that which preceded and prepared for the late war. Let us both get to close grips with reality. We have gone to Geneva to discuss naval armament, and we have both sent naval officers to do the negotiating. Both of us have begun with the assumption that war, involving our interests and safety, may break out. The duty of a naval officer is not to make peace but to safeguard his nation's interests in time of trouble, and both you and we have an admirably able and honest body of men to advise us on that matter. At Geneva it was not our mutual desire for peace that failed; it was not the impossibility of a peace policy that was demonstrated. It was a much simpler and very obvious thing. It was that, in the event of a war which brought us into conflict with each other, or that brought us separately into the strife, the naval arm that the United States would require for security would not be the same as that which England would require for security; that, indeed, if either the United States or England thought of security in relation to the hostility of each other, both of us would have to increase rather than diminish our shipbuilding. That was all that the Geneva failure proved. Was it really worth while going to Geneva for that purpose? Admirals as naval negotiators could not do other than bring out that obvious fact, and their negotiations could only expose the obvious. Then, English papers and American started their fusillades. They missed completely the reason for the failure and in good old-fashioned style went for the other side hammer and tongs. You patted yourselves on the back, kicked us, and we did exactly the same on our part; and the Atlantic became broader far and more stormy for both of us.

Then came our military—not only naval—agreement with France. For that I have nothing to say except that it illustrates the bungling of so much of our present Government's foreign policy. I do not believe that it was directed against the United States. It was simply stupid. It sacrificed our own national interests far more than it menaced yours. The country, irrespective of party, rose up and, following the lead of the Labor Party, rejected it. It would be highly improper for me to pass any opinion on the new American cruiser program; if I did so, it would quite properly be resented. But I may be allowed as an outsider who is greatly concerned with the moral authority which every great state must possess if we are to secure the conditions of a world's peace, to say that the execution of that program will be a great blow to the nation from which the Kellogg pact originated.

I will read that sentence again:

But I may be allowed as an outsider who is greatly concerned with the moral authority which every great state must possess if we are to secure the conditions of a world's peace, to say that the execution of that program—will be a great blow to the nation from which the Kellogg pact originated.

The cruiser program—

You may consider it necessary to face that, but, make no mistake, the result will be the same as though my country had not declined to countenance the Anglo-French agreement. People will say: "Oh, yes; they boast of their declaration denying that war is to be a consideration in national policy, and with a simultaneous voice vote for a larger navy," and if men can say that, it will be a bad thing for every movement seeking to establish a world peace.

Here in Europe those of us who are devoting our lives to the elimination of war from the national records of the times to come are nearer to the frontiers from which war alarms come than you are in America, and we, therefore, see phrases and words with a meaning in realistic policy somewhat different from the meaning you see in them. But we know that with America indifferent, or neutral, or pursuing its own way, our tasks are to be heavy and our defeat is to be more possible. Therefore it is imperative that steps be taken at once to end all this foolish and mischievous feeling which is alienating the United States from Great Britain.

The first thing to be done is to bring to a common table for discussion the reasons why ships are being built, why we both went to Geneva with the assumption we did, why we are thinking of trade routes being blocked, what there is between us that for immediate policy, newspaper writing, and political electioneering makes the Kellogg pact a mere collection of words strung upon a pious thread. The task of the statesmen is to make impossible the conditions upon which the masters of naval strategy spend their efforts. Why do not the statesmen act? If they are acting, why do they not give us comfort by informing us that they are? Is no attempt to be made, is none being made, to clear up the confusion of "the freedom of the seas"? Has neither of us the courage to discuss with the other what the interests and obligations of both are in, and to, the world and each other? Have both of us failed to observe how easy it is for nations to slip into war for nothing, how ready popular imagination is to be set on fire by anyone—even an almost anonymous newspaper proprietor—who cares to light a match? This is no case for private and unofficial action and conferences. The Governments must act. Both countries ought to appoint five or six of their most outstanding public men representative of the whole nation to meet and drag from the obscure corners of sulky suspicion the things which make difficulties between us. Let us know them. Mayhap fresh air would clean our minds of them. Governments are timorous, and if this be too solemn a proceeding for them to support, let them do something themselves, only we should like to be assured that they are aware of the mighty issues involved in a lack of real good will and confidence between the United States and Great Britain. No staging is too impressive for the importance of friendship between us, no pageantry too extravagant for the proclamation that difficulties have been removed. I want to involve the United States in no European escapade and no entanglements. It ought to praise its Creator night and day that that necessity is not imposed upon it as it is, alas, upon us. But those of us whose lot is cast here and whose fate it is to struggle against the powers of militarism which have been wounded but certainly not killed in the late war, should like to feel that an American hand will always be placed in ours for encouragement and that the relations between your country and mine can be held up to the world as an example of what we are striving to establish everywhere.

Mr. President, I think the real relation of the cruiser bill to the multilateral treaty has not been more eloquently or forcefully or truly expressed, and I hope the Senate will really consider those deep and overpowering expressions of friendship and will at least take this time limit for immediate construction of these cruisers out of this bill.

Now, briefly, I want to mention another political proposition that surrounds this question.

We have already, after much discussion, not on the floor but among ourselves, and much consideration of the great farm problem—the greatest economic problem of our time—decided that it ought to go over to the new administration. It is that administration that must carry it out, and whatever we might do now would be handicapped. Every reason and every consideration indicated that that great problem should be left until after the inauguration on March 4. Here is a world-wide question, one that must be of importance, not only to our own country but to all the countries in the world, one that is even being discussed, as Ramsay MacDonald discussed it, in all the countries of the world; one that has a bearing upon this great world policy; and yet, against the desire and the wish of the new President of the United States, we are to send this bill through to enactment and begin this war policy at once, whether or no.

It seems to me that the plainest considerations of common sense demand that we let this whole question go over for the consideration of the new administration.

Now, Mr. President, I see that the chairman of the committee is present, and I want to ask him a few questions in reference to the shipyards of the country, How many of them are idle and how many of them appeared before the committee? How many private yards have we that could build these warships?

Mr. HALE. At the present time the only yards that are in active operation that could build these ships are the New York Shipbuilding Co., which I believe has taken over the shipbuilding plant of the Brown-Boveri Corporation——

Mr. BROOKHART. They appeared before the committee for this bill?

Mr. HALE. Yes; a representative from that company did appear; the Newport News Shipbuilding Co.——

Mr. BROOKHART. They appeared for this bill?

Mr. HALE. I think they had a representative at the hearing; and the Bethlehem plant at Fore River, Mass.

Mr. BROOKHART. And they appeared for the bill?

Mr. HALE. I am not certain whether they had a representative at the hearings or not.

Mr. BROOKHART. Are there any other plants that would bid on these cruisers or have anything to do with their construction?

Mr. HALE. There are other shipbuilding plants that might build these ships—plants that have ways that could take care of these ships. I presume that where a large number of ships are to be built in the future, a great many plants will bid on the ships.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator means they would put in the necessary new equipment to build them?

Mr. HALE. I presume so; yes, if they have not already equipment on hand.

Mr. BROOKHART. All of those companies appeared favorable to this bill, did they not?

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President; the two above-mentioned companies appeared here to object to the so-called Dallinger amendment.

Mr. BROOKHART. They objected to that because it required half of the cruisers to be built in Government yards?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. And they wanted it fixed so that they would all be built in their yards?

Mr. HALE. I think they would have been satisfied with the old provision that was in the appropriation bills—that when time and facilities permit, ships shall be built in Government yards unless it is cheaper to build them in private yards.

Mr. BROOKHART. The idea I was seeking to develop was that they all favor the construction of the ships in some manner. The Senator says now they opposed the Dallinger amendment for building half of them in the Government yards.

Mr. HALE. Yes; I think that was the primary purpose of their coming here to Washington.

Mr. BROOKHART. Did they disclose in these hearings their present financial condition and the condition of unemployment in their yards?

Mr. HALE. The Senator can read the reports of the hearings.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; but I did not want to take the time necessary to put all that in the RECORD. I wanted to be brief in the discussion of this matter.

Mr. HALE. I think they showed that they were having very hard sledding at the present time in getting work to do in all of the private yards.

Mr. BROOKHART. And if these ships are built, that would help them to rehabilitate their business in every instance?

Mr. HALE. Naturally, if they got contracts for ships, it would help them to rehabilitate their business. I do not think they took part in any way in the question of building the ships; they simply stated that if they were to be built they wanted to have a chance to bid on them.

Mr. BROOKHART. How many of these private yards have we in the United States? How many appeared before the committee?

Mr. HALE. Very few appeared before the committee, Mr. President. Mr. Wilder appeared, representing the Brown-Boveri Co.; and I think there was some one from the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. I think there was no one from the Fore River Co.

Mr. BROOKHART. Did they have an association of any kind—an association of these shipbuilders?

Mr. HALE. I do not know exactly what the Senator means by "an association."

Mr. BROOKHART. Like the chamber of commerce, only a shipbuilders' club, or whatever you would call it?

Mr. HALE. That I can not tell the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator know how many private yards we have in this country that build vessels of this kind?

Mr. HALE. I can get the figures for the Senator. I have here a list of private shipbuilding slips capable of taking 10,000-ton cruisers:

The Federal Ship Co., which has six ways with a length of 605 feet.

The American Brown Boveri Co.—as I have said, that is now, I believe, the New York Shipbuilding Co.—with nine ways running from 602 feet to 768 feet.

The Newport News Shipbuilding Co., with eight ways running from 650 to 1,000 feet.

The Sparrows Point plant, Baltimore, Md., with five ways 600 feet in length.

The Fore River plant, with eight ways. I do not find the length here, but I presume they are something over 600 feet, as that would be necessary to take the cruisers.

The Sun Shipbuilding Co., with three ways of 500 feet, which could be lengthened for the purpose.

Making a total in these yards of 39 ways that could be used for building these cruisers.

Mr. BROOKHART. Has that statement been put in the RECORD?

Mr. HALE. I think not; no.

Mr. BROOKHART. Will the Senator permit me to insert it at this point, then?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so. I will put it in.

Mr. BROOKHART. I wanted to glance at it.

Mr. HALE. It is not entirely complete. In one case it does not give the length. I will put the table in as it is, however, without objection.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Private shipbuilding slips capable of taking 10,000-ton cruisers

(At this point Mr. BROOKHART yielded to Mr. CURTIS, who suggested the absence of a quorum, and the roll was called and a unanimous-consent agreement was entered into.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I thought the Senator from Iowa still had the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, there is one other phase of this question I desire to discuss; that is the phase presented by the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. I think the junior Senator from Maryland has made the strongest argument against this cruiser bill that will be made in this debate. I regret that it has not converted him and will not control his vote.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I pointed out that France has a standing army five times the size of that of the United States, that Italy has a standing army three times as large as our own, that Poland and Czechoslovakia each has a standing army twice the size of our Army, that Russia has 646,000 men in its standing army against 137,000 in ours, that England has 435,000 soldiers in her combined armies, while we have only, as I said, about 137,000 in our Army. I do not see how the Senator could construe that as being a very good argument against the need of cruisers, because it is obvious that the Navy and the Army must be considered together; and as long as we maintain a small Army we must have a strong Navy, behind which, in case of attack, we could organize and recruit such forces as we might need.

In that connection, may I continue a moment more in the Senator's time to point out that in France to-day 1 out of every 55 men, women, and children is in the standing army, and that in our own country 1 out of every 800 men, women, and children is in the standing Army; that in Italy 1 out of every 80 men, women, and children is in the standing army, and that besides these heavy armaments all over the world, Japan, Italy, and Great Britain exceed us in the number of cruisers of this class, which they now have or which they are building. Besides that the world owes us $26,000,000,000, including the war debt; which, as I pointed out the other day, it is doubtful if we will be able to collect; certainly we will not collect a lot of it without cruisers, in my judgment, if we really want to collect it.

If the Senator feels that those facts, as against his theories, point to the fact that we do not need these cruisers, then I am at a loss to know what logic to employ.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, if the Senator had stated those facts and then stopped, he would have a good argument for war and armament, but unfortunately for his logic he did not stop with the set of facts. He took this great debt and pointed out how we have an economic power to disband all the armies and to sink all the navies, and I think he is right. Now we have that economic power in our hands right now. Not only did he do that but he introduced a resolution calling upon the Government of the United States to stop the making of foreign loans and to check armament all over the world. I think that was a wise and far-reaching resolution. I think it is the strongest argument that has been made against the cruiser bill or any other form of armament for war.

Mr. President, this matter can be controlled through economic forces and it is that phase of it that I wish to discuss in conclusion. I feel certain that we have gone to the point of danger in economic forces not only in the United States but in the world. I think we have created an economic bubble in our own country such as the world has never before seen. I think the building of these cruisers would simply add to it and detract nothing from it. We not only control this vast credit throughout the world, but we have created a vast credit in our own country and we have turned the control of that over to the same forces that want to build the cruisers. Right now most of the surplus credit of our country is collected in New York City, in the great speculative center. It is making for disaster. It is levying a toll or tax upon every other business in the country. That situation exists throughout the whole world.

I want to read from the People's Year Book, the National and International Cooperative Congress of Great Britain, for the year 1928 a summary of the economic situation which supplements what the Senator from Maryland has already put in the RECORD. The article is by Sir George Paish, and there is perhaps no greater economic authority in the world than he. He said:

It must not be assumed that a breakdown of credit would necessarily wreck the machine of business and lead to chaos. Its seriousness would be governed by the manner in which the situation was handled when it occurred. At the beginning of the war there was a breakdown of credit. At that time no banker or business man knew where he stood. The declaration of war severed so many connections, broke so many contracts, and prevented so many people from meeting their obligations that general bankruptcy was threatened. But this breakdown was remedied for the time being by moratoria, and by the British Government agreeing to guarantee the due payment of all recognized British bills then outstanding. Subsequently it was overcome by the huge expenditures in all parts of the world of the governments of the warring nations, and by the ability of these governments to obtain the credit necessary to pay for all the goods and produce they purchased. Thus the breakdown of credit and of business was completely repaired, and in a relatively short time the machine of trade was again in working order.

In Russia, at the revolution, there was a breakdown of credit and of business. For a time trade could be carried on only by resorting to a primitive system of barter which entailed great suffering upon the Russian people. Unfortunately in this case the breakdown was not handled in a manner that enabled the Russian business machine again to function freely. The measures at first taken rendered the breakdown still more complete and more disastrous, and although these were subsequently modified, the Russian Government has not even yet applied all the measures necessary to restoration. Today, 11 years after the Russian breakdown, the Russian business machine of production and of distribution is still working intermittently and ineffectively. Not until the Russian Government and the Russian people create confidence in their ability, as well as in their willingness to fulfill any obligation they incur, will it be possible to restore the Russian business machine to full working order by a freely flowing supply of both national and international credit.

Again there were breakdowns of credit and of business in various continental countries at the close of war and on the conclusion of peace, more particularly in Austria and in Germany.

In Austria the breakdown provoked the sympathy of the whole world, and it was repaired, after the Austrian people had suffered seriously, by the assistance, first, of Great Britain and the United States, and, secondly, of the League of Nations, which furnished the Austrian people with the credit they needed to purchase what they required and to restore and expand their industries.

In Germany a business and credit breakdown occurred as a result of the revolution and also of the peace treaty, which, by preventing the German Government from raising sufficient revenue from taxation, forced it to meet its expenditures by issuing such phenomenal quantities of paper money that its notes ceased to have any value. This breakdown was effectively repaired by the issue of currency notes, known as Renten marks, secured by a mortgage upon industry and agriculture, as well as by the Dawes plan of reparations, which, by limiting German reparation payments to sums within the power of Germany to meet with the aid of foreign credit, restored confidence in Germany's future and enabled her to borrow abroad large sums for the restoration of her currency and of her industry.

VICTORS AND VANQUISHED AFFECTED

Were another breakdown of credit and of business to take place such as that of 1914 or of those in Russia and Germany, its magnitude and its effect would depend not only upon the willingness of the nations to repair it but on the efficacy of the measures they would be prepared to take in order to restore the great world machine of credit and of business to full working order. Indeed, the threatened breakdown might be altogether averted if the nations were even now prepared to take the measures they must take after the breakdown.

The grave danger of a breakdown, both of credit and of trade, to which the nations are now exposed, is a world danger which, if not averted, will bring distress and suffering to every country. It arises from the dislocation caused by the war as well as by the perfectly impossible policies pursued by the nations since the war. It is the result of the folly and ignorance of the statesmen who did not realize that war in these days injures the victors as much as it does the vanquished and that its consequences bring nothing but sacrifice.

The war plunged the nations into debts which they could not honor; it injured the trade they needed to support their peoples; it destroyed a very large amount of their accumulated capital; it absorbed the capital they required for opening up the world to settlement and for the expansion of production; it caused nations to develop unnatural industries; and it injured the natural industries of other nations. Unfortunately, the statesmen who drafted the peace treaties had a very inadequate idea of the steps needed to repair the mischief of the war and imposed conditions which could not be fulfilled, as well as reparations that could not be paid.

The one great reconstructive measure of the treaties—the League of Nations—was very much to the good, but its power to rectify the situation was hampered by the unwillingness of the statesmen to permit it to apply the proper remedies, or to entrust it with the settlement of problems which had to be settled if a breakdown was to be prevented.

The world breakdown now threatened might still be averted if the statesmen were to entrust the task of preventing it to the impartial decisions of the League of Nations, and to impose no restrictions upon the matters discussed, or reservations upon the decisions reached.

THE SICK MAN OF TO-DAY

The situation of the world to-day is that of a sick man who will neither permit his physician to make a thorough examination of his condition, nor act upon the advice he tenders after the inadequate examination he is allowed to make. The Brussels Conference of 1920 was not permitted to discuss either reparations or the peace treaties. The Genoa Conference of 1922 was deliberately wrecked in order that it should not make the recommendations which the situation called for. The decisions of the World Economic Conference of 1927 have not only been disregarded, but Great Britain has adopted the policy which that conference unanimously affirmed was injurious to world recovery, and has raised, and is raising, her tariffs instead of reducing them.

In view of the mentality which the statesmen of most of the nations still display, a complete breakdown, both of credit and of trade throughout the world, with all its distress and suffering, therefore, seems inevitable.

Ever since 1914 the great world machine of trade has been kept in motion by the creation of credit upon a scale never before witnessed. During the war this credit was obtained by governments, many of whom have since repudiated their debts in whole, or in part, by currency depreciation, or have made compositions with their creditors. Since the war this credit has been obtained by individuals and private corporations, as well as by municipalities and governments, in all parts of the world. Without this exceptional supply of credit, trade would have been impossible, and would have collapsed for lack of the necessary buying power. Many nations could not have bought what they required to buy, and other nations could not have sold what they needed to sell.

That so much credit was available was, first of all, due to the creation of a new and vast fund of banking credit by an alteration in the banking law of the United States of America, which gave the national banks of that country the power to grant more than twice the quantity of credit they had previously granted with the same cash reserves, and by a great increase of fiduciary currency in this country, which gave British bankers power to grant more than twice the quantity of credit they had previously granted. Secondly, it was due to the mobilization of the greater part of the world's stock of gold in the United States, thereby again doubling, in all, quadrupling the power of American bankers to grant credit.

These measures have enabled the United States, since 1914, to supply other nations with the products they needed to buy to the extent of over £5,000,000,000 against credit securities of one kind and another, and Great Britain to supply other countries with some £2,000,000,000 of her goods against credit securities. Beyond the produce and goods sold abroad by these two countries against securities of one kind and another, the American and British peoples themselves have been supplied with vast amounts of credit in order to buy what they needed. Thus, instead of great quantities of produce being paid for as they are under normal conditions in other products, they have not been paid for, and all the world has incurred obligations to pay interest, and, in some cases, principal as well, which can be met only by the ability of the debtors to sell their products, or services, in order to make payment.

Moreover, as conditions are to-day, many nations need still greater quantities of credit if they are to continue to purchase as much as they are now buying, and other nations need to grant credit still more freely if they are to maintain their ability to sell their products.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would like to point out to the Senator that in the last war, as he will recall, many American divisions had to use French guns or artillery; in fact as to many of the last divisions that went over the artillery supply was not heavy enough in our own country and we had to get guns from the French Government to protect our own soldiers when they advanced.

The Senator also knows that we had no airplanes on the other side during the war until near the end of it—that is, comparable to the number which our allies had; and that there was an investigation held in this country during the war, headed by Mr. Hughes, to inquire into that situation and to try to speed up the production of airplanes. Undoubtedly, if we had not been able to obtain artillery and some airplanes from our allies, we would have been in the position of asking American soldiers to go forward against a powerful enemy, equipped with all manner of guns, with no guns to support our own attack. The inevitable result of such a situation would have been the massacre of many thousands of American soldiers. While we have that lesson before us, and inasmuch as our Navy is now inadequate—that is, it is only 60 per cent as large as that of Japan in cruiser strength and only about half as large as that of England in cruiser strength, and Italy actually has two more cruisers than has the United States, does not the Senator think, in view of our experience in the last war, we should at least be as well prepared in case we need a Navy again, as any other nation is at the present time, and that a failure to prepare might result in the recurrence of the exact situation we encountered in the World War? If we should have no war, of course, we would not need the cruisers, but if we should have a war and do not have the cruisers we must pay for the cruisers not in dollars, as we can do now, but in the lives of American citizens.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have heretofore heard that argument a good many times. I will say to the Senator that my experience with the war was that one of the greatest difficulties we had was the preparation we had made up to that time. If we had not had to rid ourselves of a lot of professional military material we would have gotten ready for the war much quicker. Until the middle of the war we sent our soldiers over there trained in the theory that a poor shot gets more hits in battle than a good one. That was the military theory of the Army of the United States, taught for a whole generation, and, of course, they could not defend themselves because they were not trained to defend themselves.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there to ask how can the Senator say that the United States is a "jingo" nation, as many people would have us believe who object to this cruiser bill, when it only has an army one-fifth the size of that of France, one-third the size of that of Italy, one-half the size of that of Poland and Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia?

Mr. BROOKHART. We would be better defended than those countries are if we did not have any army.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator, then, is really advocating the complete elimination of the entire Army and the sinking of every ship and trusting all the nations who think there is such a stable peace that they must have war-sized standing armies to keep it? He thinks, then, that none of them would bother us at all? Is that correct?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; I am not advocating that theory at all, but I am advocating a theory based upon the real experience of war. I do not think the cruisers provided for by this bill will be worth a cent for any purpose after they shall have been built. They are scout ships; they go out and look over the seas, but the destroyer is a good deal better scout ship than a cruiser; it does not cost, perhaps, one-tenth as much, and we have right now a hundred more destroyers than Great Britain has.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me tell the Senator, as one of the men who went overseas during the war, that when our convoy of about 12 ships reached the middle of the ocean all our protection was taken from us; we did not have a battleship or a gunboat nor a cruiser——

Mr. BROOKHART. I notice the Senator is still here speaking in the Senate of the United States; he did not sink as a result of that condition.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; and I am very lucky to be here; but let me say this: We had to spread our forces over such a wide territory, to take care of the many activities of the Government, that we only had convoys from America and then convoys picked us up again as we neared the other side. Notwithstanding the convoy the very ship on which I went over was sunk one day out from France on its return trip. Would the Senator, if those same circumstances should arise again, be in favor of having all our transports, carrying thousands of American soldiers to wherever they were needed, without any protecting cruisers at all, without any protection whatsoever?

Mr. BROOKHART. The cruiser would not help any, and no such circumstances will arise again.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would rather have them than not have them.

Mr. BROOKHART. If we were to try to send the Senator over there now to a war he would be sunk surely; he would not get over there.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am sure if the Senator were out on the middle of the ocean going across on a transport that the sight of a cruiser or a gunboat or some other naval craft there to afford protection against a possible submarine would make him digest his meals with a great deal more ease than if it were not there.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would rather be flying with Lindbergh.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question in regard to a statement he has just made. He said that the destroyers we have would afford as ample protection as cruisers would. Can the Senator explain that?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes. Cruisers are not good for anything but as scout ships; they can not fight battleships. All a cruiser can do is to run, and a destroyer can outrun a cruiser by a wide margin; a destroyer is a much better scout ship than is a cruiser; and we have a hundred more destroyers than Great Britain has.

Mr. ODDIE. How can the Senator say that, when he considers the heavy weather that these ships have to go through at times? A destroyer can not make the speed that a cruiser can make in heavy weather; it can not begin to do it; it can not buck the heavy seas as a cruiser can at high speed.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have been on a destroyer in heavy weather.

Mr. ODDIE. So have I. Most of the cruisers which we had a few years ago and which we still have are obsolete; they lack the speed of the modern cruisers of other navies.

Mr. BROOKHART. We are providing in this bill $300,000,000 for cruisers which will be obsolete before we get them launched.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, another point: A destroyer has a certain power of offense and defense, but a modern cruiser has a greater power of offense and defense. It has longer range guns; it has a greater speed; and it can be handled better and can make better speed in heavy weather than a destroyer; it can hold the destroyer off because of the longer range of its guns over that of the destroyer. A destroyer can do nothing but escape as best it can if it can escape under such conditions in a conflict with a modern cruiser.

Mr. BROOKHART. A whole galaxy of big ships ran away and hid during the war. They went out, had one little scrap with each other, and then ran and hid again, and that at a time when we did not know as much about submarines or aircraft as we know to-day.

Mr. TYDINGS. Would the Senator be willing to go back into the State of Iowa and at a large mass meeting dispose of this question in the way he has indicated? Would he say, "In the event we should have another world war, and it were again necessary to send American troops overseas in transports, I would advocate the sending of those transports from America to France without any cruiser protection whatsoever, notwithstanding the enemy might infest the seas with submarines"?

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator is imagining an impossible situation.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have taken the exact situation as it has been stated by the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. We are not going to send them over. We have outlawed war, and the Senator voted for the treaty outlawing it, though here we find him planning another war.

Mr. TYDINGS. We have outlawed war, but I am afraid that we may "inlaw" it before the treaty is signed by all 60 nations.

Furthermore, as I pointed out the other day, Russia, the only other nation which has so far ratified the peace pact, has a standing army of 658,000 men and 5,425,000 equipped and trained as organized reserves, against 137,000 men in our own Army.

Mr. BROOKHART. Out in Iowa, let me say to the Senator, we are not afraid of that whole Russian army; they are not bothering us at all. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair) rapped with his gavel.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Russian Army had been fighting with Germany in the last war instead of against Germany, I think the Senator would have ample cause to weigh his words before he uttered them with such recklessness. The Russian Army may some day be against us, and 658,000 Russian soldiers—I think probably the Senator could dispose of them, but I have not the same confidence in my ability. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER rapped with his gavel.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will say to the Senator that out in Iowa we want one of these cruisers built on Goose Lake. It is a perfectly safe place for it. The lake is drained right now, but we can stop up the drain, so that the cruiser could float all right. That is about the only safe place in the country we will have for cruisers. We are not going to fight any war with cruisers, nor are any of the big ships going to fight any future wars. I received some expert opinion upon that question recently. I am not basing my views altogether upon my own ideas, but the information given to me indicates that if we would take the $300,000,000 that we are going to spend on these cruisers and spend it on the Air Corps they would be ready to sink all the battleships, all the naval vessels in the world, 200 miles out from our coast in five years.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Who gave the Senator that information?

Mr. BROOKHART. If our Air Corps can do it the air corps of any other country can do it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Who gave the Senator that information?

Mr. BROOKHART. There is no better authority in the United States than the one who gave it to me.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is vague, indefinite, and uncertain. Who was it?

Mr. BROOKHART. I am afraid it would not convince the Senator if I told him the general's name.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It might convince somebody else who is not so obtuse as I am.

I should like to ask the Senator another question, and perhaps he will answer it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Very well.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Does the Senator believe that a cruiser might possibly capture or sink some merchant vessels belonging to an enemy nation?

Mr. BROOKHART. A destroyer would do a much better job.

Mr. REED of Missouri. What could a destroyer do if a cruiser got after it?

Mr. BROOKHART. It would outrun the cruiser.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Could it outrun a cruiser?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly a destroyer can outrun a cruiser.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Sometimes. Now, let us talk what we mean here and not just hollo. Does the Senator mean to say that if we entered a war and England had a very large number of cruisers and we had none, that with her cruisers she would not sweep our commerce from the seas?

Mr. BROOKHART. She could do that with her destroyers or her scouts or her submarines.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is not answering the question. Maybe she could and maybe she could not. We might be able to meet her destroyers; the Senator says we have more of them than England has.

Mr. BROOKHART. There is no such thing as protecting commerce in war. It will be destroyed; it has been destroyed in all wars and it will be destroyed in all wars in the future. You can not build enough warships to protect all our commerce in a war with Great Britain.

Mr. REED of Missouri. England protected her commerce pretty well during the war, and if she had not done so her ships would have been overtaken, England would have been starved, and Germany would have won the war. Everybody except the Senator from Iowa knows that.

Mr. BROOKHART. As I have read of the number of English ships sunk, I have not seen any great amount of protection for English commerce despite the fact that her great and wonderful fleet surpassed all other fleets of the world.

Mr. REED of Missouri. She kept the German fleet bottled up, and one German ship——

Mr. BROOKHART. And a little German submarine kept an English fleet bottled up.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well. One or two German ships escaped and got upon the high seas, and destroyed millions and millions of dollars' worth of shipping—just one or two little ships—and we had no ships to send after them; at least we did not have enough.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; and why did not the big English Navy that was safeguarding English commerce protect it against the one or two little German ships?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I say again, let us talk of things that are sensible and useful to talk about. The Senator knows that the big English Navy was bottling up the big German Navy; that she kept it bottled up throughout the war; and if the German Navy had ever escaped the English Navy could not have overtaken it and the German ships would have swept every boat from the seas and sunk every transport that was bearing American soldiers across the ocean. Everybody knows that.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. ODDIE. I should like to make another observation regarding the relative speed of cruisers and destroyers. The cruisers that are proposed in this bill will have a greater speed than any destroyer we have.

Mr. BROOKHART. What is the speed proposed?

Mr. ODDIE. Something around 34 knots.

Mr. BROOKHART. The last destroyer I was on ran 36 knots.

Mr. ODDIE. I think that ought to be put on record, because I have never heard of a destroyer making over 34 knots. That is the contract speed, as I understand. A destroyer may make a greater speed under forced draft, but, Mr. President, a ship can not run long under extremely forced draft. Under the plans and specifications of these cruisers they will have a far greater radius of action than any destroyer, and will be able to run at a 100 per cent forced draft speed for many more hours than a destroyer can maintain its top speed.

The number of hours that a ship of this type can maintain a speed of 100 per cent is limited because of the enormously increased amount of fuel it will require. In this matter of protecting our ships we must consider the radius of action of these ships. A destroyer can go a few thousand miles without being refueled, a cruiser can go many more thousands of miles without being refueled. We have to look at this in a broad way.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask a question?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I am just seeking information. Is it the position of the Senator from Nevada that the cruiser is much more valuable than the destroyer?

Mr. ODDIE. It is much more valuable for certain work; but we must have both. We must have all classes of ships for a balanced fleet. We must have the destroyers, we must have the cruisers, and we must have the battleships.

Mr. WHEELER. What a balanced fleet is depends entirely upon the particular expert one happens to be talking to.

Mr. ODDIE. I am speaking about the maneuvering of a fleet.

Mr. WHEELER. Whether it is a balanced fleet or not depends entirely upon the particular expert one happens to be talking to. I was wondering whether or not the Senator thought the cruiser was much more valuable in time of war than the destroyer.

Mr. ODDIE. It is much more valuable for the work it will have to do.

Mr. WHEELER. Why was it that after the armistice, when we started out to build a great navy, we built destroyers and battleships and did not build any cruisers?

Mr. ODDIE. I think the Senator is wrong about our building destroyers after that time. We had a great many destroyers left over after the war. I do not think we have built any destroyers since that time.

Mr. WHEELER. We did not build any cruisers, did we?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; we did.

Mr. ODDIE. Yes; but some of those cruisers were scrapped. Our two large plane carriers, the Saratoga and the Lexington, were started as first-class battle cruisers.

Mr. WHEELER. They were not scrapped.

Mr. ODDIE. But they were used for the other purpose.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when this particular debate started; I heard the question of the Senator from Montana about the value of cruisers.

Mr. WHEELER. I was just asking for information with reference to the matter. I am frank to say I do not know very much about it, but I was seeking information. I wanted to find out from the Senator from Nevada which type of vessel in his judgment was the more valuable.

Mr. HALE. Without any question, the cruiser is the more valuable of the two types of vessel, and it is becoming more and more valuable as the years go on, and as a more powerful type of cruiser is being developed.

I overheard the Senator from Nevada say that the speed of the destroyers never exceeded 34 knots. I think he is mistaken about that. Some of our destroyers have made between 35 and 36 knots, and some of the foreign destroyers have gone a little bit over 36 knots.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I intended to state that as a general proposition, not to refer to particular cases.

Mr. HALE. Those vessels can only reach that great speed on a perfectly calm, glassy sea. Whenever any storm prevails, or whenever there is any sea at all, they have to cut down their speed. The cruiser, on the other hand, which is a much larger and more seaworthy vessel, can make its speed in a very lively sea, and unless it is in an absolute calm, the cruiser can overtake the destroyer, and of course, destroy it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think a fair survey of the situation shows that the English fleet was not able to protect English commerce during the war, largely due to the submarine, and the submarine was not developed one-tenth as much as it has been since.

I will say again that the best fighting men in the Navy of the United States, the junior officers, who will fight the next war if we ever get into one, are against this cruiser item. I have talked to them, but they are under that autocratic discipline found in the Navy, and they do not dare sign their names to the documents they have given me. I am expressing my ideas after consultation with both the generals of the Army and the officers of the Navy.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. If this money were appropriated for the construction of submarines, would the Senator be in favor of it?

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator would combine that with aircraft. As I understand it, if we should put this much in aircraft, in five years we would be able to sink all the navies in the world; not only the English, but all of them. I would at least like to have enough in aircraft to take care of the British Navy.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator tell us what the life of an airplane is?

Mr. WHEELER. It would last long enough to sink these 15 cruisers.

Mr. TYDINGS. It would not if the cruisers were in the middle of the sea, because they can not fly out very far and locate a ship. The Senator will find that the difficulty about building a large airplane corps is that the life of the airplanes is very short, that they deteriorate very rapidly, and that in two or three years all the airplanes we build to-day would be obsolete, whereas the cruiser will certainly be with us longer than three years.

Mr. BROOKHART. It is obsolete now; it does not have to wait three years.

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, no. It would be obsolete if the Senator's contention were upheld.

Mr. BROOKHART. As far as any usefulness is concerned in war, it is obsolete.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I want to contest the assumption that we have heard made so often on the floor of the Senate that a plane can go out and sink a ship at sea at any time. In these wild statements the question of visibility at sea is overlooked altogether. It is known by anybody who follows the sea that only at times can one see a great distance at sea. The weather is thick and hazy very frequently, and a plane can not see a ship more than a very few miles at sea. But sending a plane out hundreds of miles to sea to find a ship, not knowing just where that ship is, means either death to the pilot or failure.

Mr. President, I take off my hat to our air forces, as everybody in this Chamber does, but our air forces need these cruisers for their protection in case of conflict. I do not believe in taking away one of the main arms of protection of our air forces in case of war by denying them these cruisers.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, we come back in the discussion from the credit problem to the question we had in the beginning, and I want to finish this summary of Sir George Paish in this record, because when it is all studied and understood it will be found to be important to our whole future. He says:

> But already the power of American and British bankers to grant additional credit is becoming exhausted, and we are now within sight of its ultimate limit.

I think that was proven when money went to 12 per cent on the stock exchange. I think things are getting to a desperate stage up there. I continue the reading:

> The amount of credit already created is so fabulous that almost the whole of the immense reservoir of new credit created both in America and in England has been utilized. When it is fully utilized, nations will be face to face with the problem of how to meet the obligations they have incurred, and at the same time, of how to purchase what they urgently need to buy without the aid of credit. If they are to meet their obligations, and to buy what they require, they must be able to sell their own goods and services in order to make the payments they require to make.
> When it is borne in mind that certain nations, which are not selling nearly enough of their products to pay for what they are buying, and, consequently, are still buying extensively on credit, must (1) meet their debts by the sale of their own goods; (2) must pay for whatever they need to buy in their own goods and services, instead of by credit operations, and (3) in some cases must make reparation payments in their own goods and services instead of by fresh loans, the difficulties of the problem become obvious.
> As matters now stand it is abundantly clear that, unless the nations completely change their present policies, the debtor nations will neither be able to maintain the present level of their buying power nor meet their obligations, whether they be for interest, principal, or reparations.
> At the present time the creditor nations are strongly opposed to receiving from the debtor nations goods and services in payment of their obligations, or even in payment for the products they still continue to sell to them. And while this attitude continues how will it be possible for the debtor nations to meet their obligations, or to continue to purchase from the creditor nations when new credits are not forthcoming? Moreover, how will it be possible for internal credits, granted both in America and in Great Britain, to be met, if manufacturers, farmers, and others can not continue to sell their products in anything like the present volume?
> The liberal grants of credit by America and Great Britain have caused the currents of trade to be maintained in all parts of the world, more particularly in South America, Australia, Canada, and the Far East. These currents will also be greatly reduced as soon as this credit is not forthcoming, and nations which have hitherto purchased so freely on credit, can no longer do so.
> What will be the position of the new countries if the market for their products is restricted, and they are called upon to meet the heavy interest and other obligations they have incurred without the assistance of new credits?
> REMEDIES URGENTLY REQUIRED
> Thus, the danger of a world breakdown of credit and of trade is now by no means remote, and will rapidly approach unless steps are taken to apply the remedies urgently required.
>
> The first step demanded is an impartial and comprehensive diagnosis of the whole situation, and more particularly the credit and trade position, both international and national, in all important countries. Beyond this, investigation needs to be made of the economic effects of reparations, not only upon the countries called upon to pay them, and those entitled to receive them, but upon other countries as well.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The other day I put in the RECORD a table showing that of the $12,000,000,000 war debts the settlement to-day was worth 50 cents on the dollar, on an average. In other words, that the present value of the 62-year bonds given us to pay the war debts, plus what we actually knocked off, so to speak, of the principal owed, to-day was only about 50 per cent of what was originally borrowed. Instead of having securities to-day for $12,000,000,000 owed us in the form of war debts we have securities worth only $6,000,000,000. In addition to that, we have made loans to many of the same countries, totaling, all over the world, fourteen more billion dollars, and the world to-day owes us $26,000,000,000, and that includes every nation on the globe.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think this article fully sustains all the contentions of the Senator. That is why I am reading it. This is a review by one of the greatest economists of the world, and the facts the Senator presented I think are true in every detail, and here is a powerful way of pointing out their effect upon the nations of the world. I think the Senator's conclusion that we could stop this armament business by the proper control of that credit is absolutely true, but we can not stop it by building cruisers. That will never do it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the author of the book make that observation? Does he suggest that that course be pursued—that is, that we do not let nations that are superior to us in their navies have any more money—for example?

Mr. BROOKHART. Let us see what the details are.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was asking the Senator what remedy he offered for these so-called ills.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is what I was reading at the time the Senator interrupted me.

Sir George Paish says:

> This examination should discover the extent to which the nations that are indebted for loans or for reparations are unable to meet their obligations by the sale of their products owing to the unwillingness of the creditor nations to purchase them in sufficient quantity.

Here is exactly the remedy, I think, that the Senator himself suggested:

Further, the examination should indicate the manner in which fresh credit can be created for opening up the new countries to settlement and bringing about the necessary increase in world consumption that will enable trade to be maintained at a high level.

That certainly would stop the armament proposition.

Mr. TYDINGS. What the author is advocating is that the money which any country gets from us in effect should go into productive instead of destructive things, thereby increasing the consuming power of the world and creating customers for our products. Is that right?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I think that is right.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the author does not specifically set forth the money expended on the armies and navies derived from loans made in this country?

Mr. BROOKHART. Perhaps he may later; I do not remember; but, at any rate, that would be included in his big general proposition.

Lastly, the nations must be made to understand the necessity of readjusting their political and economic policies in order that they may promote and not destroy trade if the danger to which they are all exposed is to be averted or overcome.

I rather think that general statement would cover disarmament.

While the situation throughout the world is full of danger, it is particularly dangerous in the United States and on the Continent of Europe. In America, so much credit has been and is being created, both for home and foreign borrowers, that the supply can not be maintained and the stoppage of new credit will involve a very great collapse, both in trade and in prices, with consequences which can not be measured, having regard to the overborrowed condition of the country.

CREDIT AND POLICY

The Continent of Europe has now obtained far more credit than it can hope to repay unless world policy is completely changed. In prewar days Europe was a creditor Continent, and entitled to receive great quantities of produce in payment for the interest and principal upon credits granted to the rest of the world, and more particularly to the United States and Russia. Now it is a debtor Continent and must export its products or perform services to pay interest and principal on sums borrowed, as well as to pay for all the products it needs to purchase from outside countries.

But these outside countries, and more particularly the United States, Canada, and Australasia, have deliberately adopted a policy of excluding the goods of Europe by high tariff and other barriers. At present Europe is buying from these countries on credit granted by the United States and Great Britain, and difficulty is already arising in obtaining these credits. What will be the situation in Europe when the supply of new credit ceases, and it endeavors to meet the interest and other obligations already incurred in goods that can not be sold, and what will be the situation in the United States, Canada, Australasia, and in other countries when they can not sell their products?

Were Russia in a position to supply Europe with the food and raw material it requires, the situation would immediately become less difficult, as Russia needs to purchase all the manufactured goods she can obtain, either in exchange for her products or by credit operations. But the statesmen of Europe, of this country, as well as of Russia, are unwilling to pursue the policy which will restore Russia to prosperity, and which is urgently called for by a most difficult situation.

Hence, in view of the fact that the nations not only show no willingness to take the measures demanded in order to prevent a breakdown of both credit and of trade, but insist upon pursuing policies which, if continued, will render the breakdown inevitable, it is of great moment that the whole situation should be most carefully reviewed, so that when the breakdown does occur it may be repaired with the least possible delay and with a minimum of suffering, by the adoption of those measures which, had they been taken when the peace treaties were drafted, or in the long period that has since elapsed, would not only have prevented the crisis but would have restored the world to prosperity.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us assume that in the course of a year every nation in the world enters into the peace pact that was adopted by our country the other day; and let us assume that after they adopt the Kellogg peace pact they still maintain the armies and the navies that are now maintained, notwithstanding the adoption of the peace pact. If that situation came into existence would the Senator then be in favor of building these cruisers, or would he then still be in favor of not building the cruisers?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not think cruisers are worth much under any conditions. As a matter of efficiency I am against building the cruisers. They could not protect us, anyhow; but the thing the Senator mentions is going to be stopped if his resolution carries and we act on it, and that is what I should like to see done. I should like to see the Senator here debating for the passage of his resolution instead of putting up these imaginary wars of slaughter and destruction in the future. He has the best and the most practical resolution that has been proposed here, and it will go a long way toward eliminating the trouble which Sir George Paish pointed out in this very able article.

Mr. TYDINGS. But suppose my resolution fails, and suppose, after all the nations join in the peace pact, there is no lessening in the size of the armaments of the world?

Mr. BROOKHART. That is supposing that the Senator is wrong in his resolution and in everything he has said, and I am not making that supposition.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; the Senator is supposing that my resolution will cure all the troubles of mankind. I know that it will not do so, much as I should like to have that omnipotent power.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator had omnipotent power enough, he said, in that resolution, to stop this armament; and I think that is true.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was hoping to elicit from the Senator an answer to this question: If the peace pact were adopted by all nations, and, notwithstanding its adoption, there were no scaling down of the armies and navies of the world, would the Senator then be in favor of bringing up our Army and our Navy to something of a parity with the leading nations of the world; or, notwithstanding the failure of other nations to disarm, would he still want the United States to keep on disarming, regardless of what other nations do?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think we are very much better defended with a smaller army than almost any other nation. We do not need a big army for our defense because of our situation.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator thinks that one man would kill probably more men than a thousand?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not think any such foolish thing as that; but our situation is certainly more favorable for defense than that of England or France or Germany or any of the other European countries. The Senator knows that. We do not need any such armament as they do to have an equal defense.

Mr. TYDINGS. How long does the Senator think it would take us to raise and train an army to the size and degree of the present army of France?

Mr. BROOKHART. If we had the right ideas of training, it would not take very long.

Mr. TYDINGS. But with the ideas that we have?

Mr. BROOKHART. If we had the old professional ideas that we had at the beginning of the war, it would take a long time.

Mr. TYDINGS. And where would we get the artillery to give to this so-called army that we had equipped so hastily? Where is the artillery to support them coming from? Have we it now?

Mr. BROOKHART. If we went across to Europe, we would not have artillery. If we stayed at home and minded our own business, we would have plenty with those that we have now.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator did not answer my question. I asked him where we were going to get the guns to give this army after we had trained them. Have we the guns now?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; we have some guns.

Mr. TYDINGS. Where is the artillery?

Mr. BROOKHART. We have all we need now.

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, no; we have not. We have only enough to take care of the men who are actually in the service. If we did train a new army we would have no machine guns, no trench mortars, no light artillery, no heavy artillery, no tanks, no minenwerfers, and no airplanes with which to equip them. So the Senator thinks, then, that we are amply prepared on land; does he?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think so. We have 3,000 miles of front up here along the Canadian border, and I do not feel afraid of them.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me put the question in another way. If there were 644,000 Canadian soldiers on the Canadian frontier, and 727,000 Mexican soldiers on the Mexican frontier, and only 137,000 soldiers in our own Army, would the Senator then feel the same degree of security that he now does?

Mr. BROOKHART. Well, I am not afraid. I am not scared at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. The situation I have pointed out is the exact situation in which Germany now finds itself. Added to the armies I have mentioned there are 280,000 more Polish soldiers and 260,000 more Rumanian soldiers, besides the 727,000 French on one border and 644,000 Russians on the other.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does it occur to the Senator that every proposition he has submitted to me is an imaginary one, and that the actual facts do not exist at all, and we are not called upon to meet them at all?

Mr. TYDINGS. Except that the cruiser bill is actually here, and it is necessary to call these exact facts—they are not imaginary—to the attention of the Senator from Iowa to show the full degree of preparedness which we have in our own country compared to all the other nations of the world.

Mr. BROOKHART. There is no doubt but that the patriotic shipbuilders are looking out for the profits of the cruiser bill; and those facts are right here. There is no doubt about that at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. The patriotic farmers are looking for the profits in farm products, and so on. I do not hold that that is any crime. We are all looking for some profit; but the question here is, Do we actually need these cruisers or do we not need them? If we have only 137,000 men in our standing Army, and have no artillery, no machine guns, no trench mortars, no airplanes, and no tanks to equip an army, even if we raised one, we obviously need a good, strong Navy out there in front, in time of need, behind which we can carry on these activities until we get our Army up to the point where it might be effective. Without that Navy, and with other nations having navies superior to our own, in time of war we would find that we would have to fall back to the Appalachian Mountains and keep up some sort of warfare until we could recruit and equip the men needed to drive out an invader. The Senator can not escape that conclusion.

Mr. BROOKHART. What do we need such a Navy for? Who is going to fight us? Who is after us? I have not heard of anybody being after us.

Mr. TYDINGS. If we had had no Navy in the last war, and the English Navy had been sunk, the thing I have pictured would have been a reality, because we would have had the German Navy attacking our coast if the English Navy had not been between us, in addition to our own.

Mr. BROOKHART. And if the Germans had had no navy and no army we would have had no war, and we would have been all right. That is what I want to get rid of—war. Let us imagine the whole line, clear down.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator imagine it clear down, then, and say that if there had been no German nation there might not have been any war.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think there would have been a war in Missouri even then.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not know whether that is true or not; but if I were going to have a war with anybody it would be with the Senator from Iowa, and I know that when he came down he would come with a gun. He would not come empty handed.

Mr. BROOKHART. He would not come on the theory that a poor shot gets more hits than a good one.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I desire to announce that on to-morrow, when the pending bill is laid before the Senate, I shall, with the permission of the Senate, submit some remarks.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I merely wish to put myself on record in relation to the pending bill. The Rev. Sydney Smith after returning on one occasion from the bedside of a sick child said that he had given it a dose of castor oil and had read over it the collect for the sick, and that now it was ready for either world. So I suppose it can be said, now that we have ratified the Kellogg peace pact and are about to pass the cruiser bill that the United States will soon be ready for either world peace or world war.

Before I turn to the pending bill, however, I desire to make just a preliminary observation or two. In the first place, I wish to say that my attitude toward the bill will not be in the slightest degree influenced by anything in the nature of unfriendliness to Great Britain. Far from it. Next to my own country, there is no country in the world to which I am so deeply attached as Great Britain, including Ireland. My family derivation, like that of most of the individuals among whom I was born and bred, goes back as straight as the flight of a bee to an English or Scotch ancestry. I doubt whether the world is not even more indebted to English civilization than it is to the "glory that was Greece and the grandeur that was Rome," to borrow a line from Edgar Allan Poe. Parliamentary institutions and ordered freedom throughout the world are mainly modeled upon English examples. No people have ever produced nobler types of manhood, no people have ever produced gentler or more gracious types of womanhood than the English people. The English character is made of the same sterling stuff as English woolen and leather goods. Nowhere in the world do higher standards of commercial integrity obtain than in England. Nowhere in the world is crime more sternly rebuked. No people are more faithful to their plighted troth than the English people; and I could not conclude what I am saying about them without recalling the charm that has been lent to my existence by those masterpieces of English literature which I wish that I could carry with me beyond the grave, as the Indian savage hoped that he might carry his bow and arrows. Fortunately, in the Hon. Sir Esme Howard, the present British ambassador to this country, we have a striking illustration of all that is most admirable and winning in English manhood.

Nor do I lack sympathy with any effort to bring about the general disarmament of the world, so far as practicable, both on sea and land, or to secure the freedom of the seas. Those ideas do not recommend themselves more strongly to the convictions of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] than they do to me.

But it does seem to me that this is not the time for taking up those ideas in a practical way and attempting to bring about any real results in relation to them. Personally I have little faith in their ever being carried into effect, except as a part of some general, universal, international concert. The one thing with which we need concern ourselves at this moment is the admission made frankly by almost every Member of this body that our naval strength, so far as cruisers are concerned, has fallen far below anything like a plane of naval equality with Great Britain, and is rapidly tending to fall lower than that. As has been stated by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] even if we built the 15 cruisers England would still have some 80,000 or so more tons of cruiser strength than our country, and the cruiser strength of Japan would be only some 90,000 tons less than ours. That would be the situation, I say, after everyone of the 15 cruisers had not only been laid down, but had been constructed and launched, and it is the situation which above all others should influence us in our relations to the pending measure.

"But," said the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], "let us postpone construction of the cruisers until we shall have seen whether we shall not be able to enter upon some satisfactory convention with Great Britain looking to the creation of naval parity between her and us, and the freedom of the seas." "And let us see," said the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], "before we build the 15 cruisers whether we can not enter into some compact with Great Britain by which Great Britain shall agree to level her naval strength down to the same plane as ours."

But it is a noticeable fact that both of those Senators have said that, should our efforts to bring about naval parity between Great Britain and the United States and the freedom of the seas fail, they would both be in favor of our cruiser strength being increased as is proposed, or to an even greater degree.

Let me digress just for a moment to quote the exact language of the two Senators in that connection. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said:

> If there can not be an agreement as to disarmament and an agreement with reference to the rights of neutrals, the United States will go forward until she will build a navy which will prevent interference with the commerce of the United States in case any nation sees fit to undertake to interfere with it.

Then the Senator was interrupted by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] as follows:

> Mr. HALE. And the Senator thinks we should not do that?
> Mr. BORAH. I think we should if that happens.

So much for the Senator from Idaho. I quote now what the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] said in the same connection:

> I am eager, however, to see initiated another attempt to reach an agreement for the limitation of naval armament, failing which I am prepared to vote for the construction of not only 15 cruisers but for any other additions to our naval forces required to put past doubt that it is at least equal in strength to the British Navy.

So the only line of demarcation between myself and other Senators who feel about the pending bill as I do, and the Senators from Idaho and Montana, is that we think that all the 15 cruisers should be laid down within the next three years, and those two Senators think that they should not be laid down until efforts shall have been unsuccessfully made to bring about a lasting agreement between Great Britain and the United States looking to naval parity between the two countries and to the establishment of the freedom of the seas.

Now, Mr. President, what reasonable ground is there for thinking that within any measurable space of time any such agreement can be arrived at? Surely such an expectation can not be founded upon the results of the disappointing Washington Naval Disarmament Conference of 1921. Surely it can not be founded upon the results of the abortive Geneva Naval Disarmament Conference of 1927. To think, after those two fruitless conferences, that anything in the way of a satisfactory result is likely to be obtained from another such conference within a reasonable space of time reminds me of the famous observation of Dr. Samuel Johnson about second marriages. He said that they were the triumph of hope over experience.

We went into the Washington conference, and if I did not have the confidence that I have in the sincerity with which Great Britain entered into that conference, I should say that we were simply duped by her.

We scrapped a large part of our entire Navy, and, in comparison with our sacrifices, Great Britain scrapped almost nothing. Japan, it is true, did scrap a large tonnage, but the combined sacrificial offerings that Great Britain and Japan made upon the altar of international peace at the Washington conference were on the whole small as contrasted with the generous, even lavish, offerings that we made upon the same altar. We were in a fair way to become by far the strongest naval power in the whole world. We had what almost might be termed a gigantic naval program under way, but believing that Great Britain and the other powers who were parties to the Washington Disarmament Conference were disposed honestly to reciprocate the unselfish considerations by which we were influenced in our desire to bring about lasting international peace, we scrapped some of the finest battleships and finest cruisers in the world. We also entered into an agreement fixing a maximum limit for cruiser tonnage and the caliber of cruiser guns. We also entered into an agreement not to make a more liberal provision for our need for naval bases and stations in the waters of the Pacific Ocean.

Moreover, we entered into an agreement fixing the ratio of capital naval strength in the future as between the United States, Great Britain, and Japan at 5–5–3. We were even willing to enter into a similar compact with respect to other war vessels than battleships and battle cruisers, such as light cruisers, destroyers, and submarines.

I do not think that our people can justly claim in general respects any degree of moral superiority over the other great civilized powers of the world, but I do think that it can be truly said that in their international relations they are of a distinctly more generous and confiding character than any other civilized people in the world; and since the Geneva naval conference it has been demonstrated that they can be of that character at times to their cost.

The Geneva conference of 1927 followed the Washington conference of 1921. At the Geneva conference a determined effort was made by our representatives to arrive at a footing of naval parity with Great Britain as respects cruisers; and while the results of that conference were not so unfortunate to us in point of pecuniary loss as were the results of the Washington conference, they were perhaps even more unfortunate in other respects because of the seeds of suspicion and distrust that they sowed between Great Britain and ourselves.

I am not censuring Great Britain because the Geneva conference was a failure. I am not imputing bad faith to her. The truth of it is that the naval strength of Great Britain and the naval strength of the United States are not commensurate terms. They simply can not be reduced to a common denominator. England has naval bases throughout the world; we have only a few. Her special naval needs are wholly different from ours. Small cruisers, and a great number of them, merchant vessels that can be readily turned into ships of war, are her need. With our lack of naval bases and stations, large cruisers of 10,000 tons are our need. In my judgment, it is in the highest degree unjust not to recognize the peculiar naval exigencies of Great Britain. If the lanes of the sea were closed to her, her people would die of starvation in seven weeks. It is essential to her very existence that she should maintain a great fleet, and a fleet properly adapted to her special requirements. Her power extends throughout the world. As Webster told us in his sublime language, her "morning drumbeat, following the sun, and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England." Wherever that power finds a foothold—and it never finds a foothold except for the promotion of law and order and human liberty and civilization—her ships must follow, and this we should not forget they were doing long before any thought of naval equality with her on our part arose.

But while I have no censure for Great Britain because of the Geneva stalemate, the results of that conference as well as of the preceding Washington conference, warrant us in my opinion in thinking that no good or fruitful purpose is likely to be subserved by bringing about another conference simply between Great Britain and ourselves, and one or two other additional powers, perhaps, in relation to naval disarmament and the freedom of the seas.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not true also that if we were to secure a conference as provided for in the proposed Borah amendment would we not be in a very much stronger position to secure a reasonable disarmament by letting the other nations know that we intended to be in a position to protect our rights against any of them?

Mr. BRUCE. Of course we would. As the old saying goes, "One sword keeps another in its scabbard." While that is not always true, it is often true. Least of all is there any probability of any agreement being reached at another such conference in relation to the freedom of the seas.

That has been but a bright, deceitful dream of this country ever since the eighteenth century, when the great Franklin first brought forward his views with reference to neutral rights. In my opinion it is unreasonable to expect Great Britain to enter into any understanding with us with respect to the freedom of the seas unil there has been some general disarmament throughout the world, not only on sea, but on land, as the result of a world-wide understanding that included all the civilized powers of the world.

A good deal has been said about the injury perpetrated by Great Britain upon our commerce during the World War. All I have to say is that if Great Britain were to make a promise, which in my judgment she will never do except agreeably with some universal plan of disarmament on both sea and land, that she would not under the same conditions repeat that injury, high as is my opinion of her good faith, I should not believe her. During the World War, before we entered it, she was in a situation where as a matter of self-preservation she had to deal with our commerce as she did, and the fact that she was to no small extent warranted in doing so is shown by the tolerant attitude of our people. I am not speaking of our Government. It sometimes criticized Great Britain all the more severely because it was not yet ready to cope with the military strength of Germany, I am speaking of the people of the United States. What did Walter Hines Page do, whatever just criticism his official conduct may deserve in some respects, but correctly interpret the spirit of our people? His relations to the maritime questions that arose between us and Great Britain during the World War were colored, after all, merely by the general feeling of the American people that Great Britain was not simply fighting for herself but for us as well; indeed, for human freedom and progress everywhere on the globe. He and his people thought that it would be not only a selfish but a short-sighted thing for us under the circumstances, having to such a great extent the same aims and motives, that Great Britain had to be too severe in our resentments toward her because of her interference with our shipments of cotton, copper, and other commodities that under conditions of modern discovery and invention are truly as much contraband of war as munitions of war, strictly speaking.

Does not every one of us realize that if England should ever again be involved in a great armed conflict that required the full use of her fleet, in all probability the commercial situation that existed during the World War would be reproduced, and that there would be the same call upon our people for leniency and toleration as during the World War? In other words, during the World War our people were in very much the same position that they were during the Napoleonic wars, when they saw Napoleon, with his inordinate ambition, striding with sword and iron-heeled boots over all Europe. They foresaw that if Germany subjugated Europe, our turn would come next. As John Randolph of Roanoke said during the Napoleonic wars, it looked as if the United States might have no choice but that of Ulysses in the cave of Polyphemus—that is to say, the choice of being the last to be devoured.

That was our predicament during the World War; and it was from that predicament that the British fleet, more than any other human agency in the world, extricated us.

If I had been one of the representatives of the United States at the Geneva conference I would have said to the British representatives in the end, for want of any general disarmament conference, looking to the reduction of both naval and land armaments throughout the civilized world: "Have whatever cruisers you feel to be necessary for your special needs. The British taxpayer will not allow the British Government to have more than are really necessary for those needs, because the British people, like ourselves, are a peace-loving people, and will always struggle against war as long as any self-respecting people should struggle against it." And if I had been one of the English representatives at the Geneva conference, I would have said to the American representatives at that conference: "Have whatever cruisers you feel to be necessary for your special needs. The American taxpayer will not allow the American Government to have more than are really necessary for those needs, because the American people, too, are a peace-loving people, and will struggle against war as strenuously as the British people."

The only effect of the two countries attempting to impose mutual limitations upon each other in the matter of naval armament has been to create the atmosphere of apprehension, distrust, and suspicion which unhappily now envelops them; and would never have existed if it had not been more or less artificially produced. Personally, I think that it is an unfortunate thing that any naval disarmament conference to which Great Britain and the United States have been parties should ever have taken place. It is my honest belief—I know not how generally it is shared—that nothing but evil has resulted from those conferences. Until they were held, there was no real distrust of Great Britain in this country. The British fleet had been regarded as a safeguard of American security rather than as a menace to it.

How often had I heard the opinion expressed in the United States before the talk of naval ratios at the Washington conference that the British fleet was not only a protection to the independence of our country but to human liberty and civilization throughout the world!

I deem it a mistake, therefore, to take into account at the present time the possibility of any such conference as is contemplated by the Senators from Idaho and Montana [Mr. BORAH and Mr. WALSH]. All that should be left to some future general disarmament conference of the world—held under the auspices of the League of Nations. That league may never be endued with enough power to establish anything like world-wide peace; but, if it shall be unable to do it, in my judgment, no other human agency will be able to do it. I think that the civilized world might well say of the League of Nations, in the language of the old hymn:

> Other refuge have I none;
> Hangs my helpless soul on thee.

Land disarmament and naval disarmament should go along pari passu under the direction of the league. In my opinion naval disarmament will never be achieved except in companionship with land disarmament. The use for naval armaments originates in land conflicts. Every battle on the sea is preceded by collision on shore.

So far as I am concerned, I think that Great Britain would do a fatuous thing if, in advance of any general naval and land disarmament, she were to agree to strip herself of any considerable part of her panoply of naval power. But I look forward to the time—I trust that the thought is not utterly visionary—when this country will assume its just share of responsibility for world peace and become a member of the League of Nations, and when that code of international law cherished by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] will have been realized and will be in actual course of administration by the World Court—in other words, when international peace shall have been institutionalized and policed, and shall be founded upon some basis firmer than Kellogg peace pacts or any other mere paper professions or promises.

So I say, let us go right ahead along the line pointed out so clearly by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] yesterday. Let us keep the time limit in the pending bill. Let us vote down the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], as modified by the suggestion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. Let us lay down the 15 cruisers, construct them, and launch them, without reference to contingent events which we can not now forecast. If later on there is some general disarmament conference, or even some special naval disarmament conference, our ability to accomplish something in the nature of practical results would certainly be likely, as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] suggests, to be far greater should we enter such a conference on the footing of at least something like cruiser equality with Great Britain and Japan, the other two great maritime powers of the world.

PROPOSED SALE OF UNITED STATES LINES

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to submit a resolution which I ask to have read, and I shall then request unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). The resolution will be read.

The resolution, S. Res. 317, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board be, and it is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate at the earliest practicable moment the following information:

1. To what extent have the negotiations gone for a sale of the United States Lines to Paul W. Chapman (Inc.), or to any other person or corporation?

2. If such negotiations are in progress, what is the price offered for each ship; and what ships are included, and what is the total price offered?

3. Is the line known as the United States Lines, now being maintained by the United States Shipping Board, being operated at a profit or loss? Give the full facts.

4. Give all the facts and figures concerning the proposed sale of such line, with the reasons of the board for such sale.

5. Give the cost of such vessels and the market value thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I have already presented the resolution to the chairman of the Commerce Committee, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and he sees no objection to it.

Mr. JONES. I see no objection to the resolution in the form it is in.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered and adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, January 29, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Praise belongeth unto Thee, most gracious Father in Heaven. Again we have experienced Thy tender care. We pray that we may rise to that holy ambition that covets pure fellowship and that glorifies common life in sympathetic service. Give a tone and taste to our minds so that our devotion to our country's welfare shall be the grandest type that our citizens have ever witnessed. As we face problems that shall test the sincerity of our loyalty, Oh, do Thou fortify us with a fine reserve of moral power. Just come into our souls with those enlarged and ennobled virtues which are so apparent on the higher levels of life. Bless the Republic and fill all its sails with a holy energy, and let the winds carry it over the lands and over the seas. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TRANSFER OF RETURNS OFFICE

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9570, just reported from the Senate with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9570. The Clerk will report the bill and the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9570) to provide for the transfer of the returns office from the Interior Department to the General Accounting Office, and for other purposes.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

MAINTENANCE OF PUBLIC ORDER DURING INAUGURAL CEREMONIES

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 198 and consider the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 198. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 198) to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the presidential inauguration ceremonies in 1929.

Resolved, etc., That $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, payable in like manner as other appropriations for the expenses of the District of Columbia, is hereby authorized to be appropriated to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to maintain public order and protect life and property in said District from the 28th of February to the 10th of March, 1929, both inclusive, including the employment of personal services, payment of allowances, traveling expenses, hire of means of transportation, cost of removing and relocating street-car loading platforms, and other incidental expenses in the discretion of the commissioners. Said commissioners are hereby authorized and directed to make all reasonable regulations necessary to secure such preservation of public order and protection of life and property, and to make special regulations respecting the standing, movements, and operating of vehicles of whatever character or kind during said period; and to grant, under such conditions as they may impose, special licenses to peddlers and vendors to sell goods, wares, and merchandise on the streets, avenues, and sidewalks in the District of Columbia, and to charge for such privilege such fees as they may deem proper.

Such regulations and licenses shall be in force one week prior to said inauguration, during said inauguration, and one week subsequent thereto, and shall be published in one or more of the daily newspapers published in the District of Columbia, and in such other manner as the commissioners may deem best to acquaint the public with the same; and no penalty prescribed for the violation of any of such regulations shall be enforced until five days after such publication. Any person violating any of such regulations shall be liable for each such offense to a fine not to exceed $100 in the police court of said District, and, in default of payment thereof, to imprisonment in the workhouse of said District for not longer than 60 days. And the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby likewise authorized, to be expended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the construction, rent, maintenance, and expenses incident to the operation of temporary public-comfort stations, first-aid stations, and information booths during the period aforesaid, including the employment of personal services.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that a similar bill has passed the House.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate joint resolution?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1929

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 15848, with Senate amendments, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 15848, with Senate amendments, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15848) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Indiana whether, if consent is given to take this bill to conference, he will agree, before the House disagrees to the Senate amendments, to bring back to the House for its consideration the Senate amendments on prohibition enforcement and income-tax refunds?

Mr. WOOD. We will bring it back, whether it is agreed to or not. I will say we will bring it back.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does that mean that if the gentleman does bring it back the House will have an opportunity to vote on both propositions?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Does this preclude anybody from offering amendments? Do you want to send it to the committee?

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman from New York that if this bill goes to conference under the rule we will have to bring these two amendments back, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], and after that any amendment may be proposed.

Mr. FISH. I want to say that I have a preferential amendment to include narcotic enforcement in this provision. There is no use in making a motion now if you are coming back later on.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I want to get a little more definite statement from the gentleman from Indiana if I may. As I understand the rule governing conferences, if the Senate should recede from its amendment, you would not deem it necessary to bring it back?

Mr. WOOD. That is true.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If the Senate desires to recede, will the gentleman promise to bring it back?

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman that——

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I want the gentleman to make a specific statement that he will bring these two amendments back, so that the House may express itself.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the gentleman can not do that if the Senate recedes from its amendment.

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman that he has anticipated what can not possibly happen. Knowing the attitude of the gentlemen on the other side and the temper they have already manifested in reference to the amendment, and considering the information that comes to me, I understand that under no circumstances will they recede. So I am free to say this: It would put the House conferees in a very embarrassing position if the thing should occur that the gentleman from Texas is anticipating, which never will occur; that is, that the Senate will recede as to these two amendments; and if the Senate does not recede, then we would have to come back to the House.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. These two amendments are of major importance, I think, and the House ought to have the right, and would have the right under the rules governing the sending of this bill to conference, of debating it under the 5-minute rule. So, as I say, I think the House should have an opportunity to express itself on these amendments; and that is the assurance we want from the gentleman from Indiana, and

I think we are entitled to that assurance if we permit this bill to go to conference by unanimous consent.

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I think I can answer his inquiry in this way: Suppose the thing happened that the gentleman thinks might possibly happen, which I think never will happen, that the Senate will recede and there is a conference report brought back; then the very question the gentleman wishes to raise he can then raise upon the adoption or rejection of the conference report.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. You can not do that, because that does not bring before the House the direct issue I have in mind. We know, if the gentleman will permit—and when I say "we" I think this entire House knows—that the Senate conferees are not in sympathy with these amendments, and they would very willingly recede. If the House conferees asked them to recede, they would recede, and you would bring back a complete report, and the House would never have an opportunity to vote on these two propositions. All I ask of the gentleman is to assure the House that before he permits the Senate to recede he will bring those two propositions back for an expression on the part of the House.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. BEGG. I would like to say to the gentleman from Texas that this is an appropriation bill, and the House, under its rules, has no right to put legislative amendments on an appropriation bill. Now, if the Senate of its own volition recedes, how can the conferees bring back something for a vote which is contrary to the rules of the House?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. We can do that, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, by sending this bill to conference under the rules of the House. Then we will have an opportunity to debate it under the 5-minute rule and vote on these two propositions.

Mr. BEGG. That is the gentleman's responsibility.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. And that is all I ask if we send the bill to conference by unanimous consent.

Mr. BYRNS. May I say this: According to the experience of everyone who has served on conference committees all the gentleman from Indiana would have to do would be to say to the Senate conferees that he had agreed to bring these amendments back for a vote on the part of the House and that would end the matter and they would be brought back. But if we send this bill to conference by unanimous consent, and if the Senate should recede on either of these amendments, the gentleman from Indiana would not have to bring the amendments back for a vote on the part of the House. But if the gentleman from Indiana would say to the Senate conferees that he had agreed to bring these particular amendments back for a vote that would end it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. To what amendment is the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Tennessee referring?

Mr. BYRNS. I was referring to the amendment relating to prohibition and the amendment relating to tax refunds.

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, there are two amendments relating to prohibition.

Mr. BYRNS. Well, I was referring to the amendments relating to prohibition and the amendment relating to tax refunds.

Mr. HASTINGS. As I understand, the gentleman is referring particularly to the Harris amendment?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is what I wanted to know, and we ought to know definitely. As I now understand, the gentleman's remarks have reference to the $24,000,000 amendment and the tax-refund amendment.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Let me say to the gentleman, in order that the matter may be clear, there is no reason why the gentleman should not bring back to the House of Representatives all amendments affecting appropriations applicable to prohibition and all amendments affecting the item of $75,000,000 for refunds.

Mr. DYER. Then what is the use of the conference at all?

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will permit, I think the gentleman from Indiana has yielded to me. The request now made is with regard to the three legislative amendments put on by the Senate, each one of which would have been subject to a point of order if offered in the House. The gentleman is asking the conferees to go to conference with respect to those amendments with their hands absolutely tied. Now, under the rules, before they can be accepted they must come back to the House for a separate vote on each one of them, and the House has its opportunity to act upon them; but if the Senate recedes on any one of the three—and it may be necessary or desirable to accept some and not others—but if the Senate recedes as to any one of the three amendments, it is proposed the House conferees can not accept such recession but must come back. I have looked over the bill and about all there is in it of a controversial character is these three amendments, and the gentleman wants to have the hands of the conferees tied before they ever go to conference.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If the gentleman is so insistent about not tying his hands, all he has to do is to walk out of the committee room, report his bill back to the House of Representatives, and take it up under the 5-minute rule, and send it to the Senate under the rules of the House of Representatives. The gentleman is asking for a concession. The gentleman is asking us to send it to conference by unanimous consent, which we are willing to give if the gentleman will only give us an opportunity to express ourselves on these points.

Mr. CRAMTON. What is the use of having unanimous consent to do something that accomplishes nothing? There are ways in which such action can be taken and the rules of the House followed. What is the use of marching up the hill under an agreement to-day and to-morrow marching down the hill again?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A motion now to accept the Senate amendment is preferential and we could go to the bat with it right now.

Mr. CRAMTON. That can be done to-day if the gentleman wants to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Unless we can get a satisfactory agreement, that will be done.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is no threat with any terrors.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not on my part, I am sure.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have not had an expression from the gentleman from Indiana in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] that he will say to the Senate conferees, "I have agreed to bring these amendments back to the House of Representatives," and thereby give us an opportunity to vote on them.

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Texas, as I stated a while ago, I do not think there is a possibility of the situation arising which he has in mind, but I want to be perfectly frank with the gentleman from Texas, and if the Senate conferees should recede upon either one of the three amendments we would be in no attitude whatever, if we are opposed to the amendments, to bring those matters back.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I understand then that if the Senate should recede on any one of these amendments that the gentleman would not insist upon bringing it back to the House of Representatives?

Mr. WOOD. We would be in no position to do that.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the gentleman a question in regard to amendment 17? This is an amendment where perhaps some change in the language will be desired. It seems to me that this amendment ought to go to conference entirely unhampered, so that the language may be changed.

Mr. BYRNS. What amendment is that?

Mr. TILSON. The amendment providing $250,000 for a study of law enforcement.

Mr. BYRNS. I will say to the gentleman that so far as that particular amendment is concerned, it seems to me the House could consider both of them, both applying to the same subject, at the same time, and I see no reason why it should not go along with the other amendments. I think this should be done in all fairness, because, as I said a while ago, there is not any question about it. It has been done before to my actual knowledge, and if the gentleman from Indiana will only say to the Senate conferees, "I have agreed with the House that I will give every Member of the House an opportunity to vote on these three amendments," that ends the matter. It is a very simple request.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will permit, take the amendment to which I have called the gentleman's attention; under the gentleman's proposal would you not have to vote it up or down? The purpose of the amendment is good, but I should not like to have it accepted in its present form. It seems to me the only thing to do is to disagree to the amendment and send it to the committee of conference, so that the conferees may use their judgment as to the proper form of the amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman does not lose any rights.

Mr. TILSON. But the committee of conference would not have an opportunity to do anything about it, because they would have to bring the whole thing back to the House.

Mr. BYRNS. But any agreement that may be made here would not affect the right of the conference committee or any member of the conference committee to come back to the House when the vote is taken on the amendment and move to concur in the amendment with an amendment. So the gentleman does not lose any rights with reference to that particular amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, as I have said before, about all there is in this conference that is controversial is with respect to really two amendments, the $24,000,000 amendment and the tax-refund amendment. The request that has been made ties the hand of the House conferees so that they can not confer on these amendments, and there is no use going to conference under such circumstances. Now, there is a way under the rules—and the gentlemen know it—by which they can get action to-day before we go to conference.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; and then the Members will have an alibi in voting against this amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. I know of some gentlemen and groups of gentlemen who are experts on looking for alibis these days.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman can not put me in that category.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that there is a rule in the House of Representatives now by which you can consider this bill, and that is the rule bringing the bill back from committee and considering it in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, just as the original appropriation bill was considered. Why do you not do it?

Mr. WOOD. I will say that we are following the course that has been followed with reference to every appropriation bill since I have been here.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman from Texas is the ranking minority member of the Ways and Means Committee, and all the time that I have been in the House I have never heard the gentleman from Texas ask that that course be taken with reference to any bill that came from his committee, that he says now should be followed, not even when he claimed he wrote the revenue bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman yield? I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas whether in the case of the amendments relating to the tax refund the Senate had changed its mind or would change its mind whether any definite result would follow from bringing it back except to give our very good friend from Texas another opportunity to make one more speech on the matter?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Let me say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I want to see if the House of Representatives is in accord with its original expression.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, it is apparent to all of us that the only two matters that are in controversy are the tax and prohibition amendments. It is also apparent that the membership of the House is intensely interested in both amendments; and as they have different views, before there can be a satisfactory settlement, the House must have an opportunity to vote upon both of these amendments; why would not the whole matter be settled by asking unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table this bill and consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole? Then, each one of the amendments will come up for consideration; you could move to concur or concur with an amendment, and the whole proposition then can be threshed out in the House. It seems to me that in matters of this kind it is better for the House itself to pass on these amendments than to commit them to three Members of the House as conferees, no matter how able they are. It seems to me it would be fair to let the House consider the two amendments, and consider them under the general rules, when they would be open to amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the first request was that we should go to conference and go with hands tied so that we could do nothing. The present request is not to have any conference, but to let the House be the committee on conference. Now, that has an appealing power to the popular mind, but the gentleman from Georgia does not believe that that is a policy that ought to be followed generally in matters of legislation, because time does not permit.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. We have got all day.

Mr. CRISP. I agree with my friend as a general proposition, but when the House has no other business to transact, when we are adjourning from Friday until Monday, we have ample time to consider the two amendments.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman's request, if followed, would open up for debate not only these matters that he alludes to but the claim of Lucy Knox, the claim of V. U. Irwin, claims for a few hundred dollars, and the whole 30 or 40 immaterial amendments.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, my suggestion was to consider it in the Committee of the Whole House, which operates under the 5-minute rule, and on any one of the amendments, when there has been five minutes of debate, the gentleman can demand the previous question.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is the gentleman so afraid of debate upon these two important amendments that he wants to limit debate to five minutes?

Mr. CRISP. Oh, I said that if the majority of the House wants to limit it to five minutes, they have the power. I think these amendments ought to be very fully discussed.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, there are two ways that can be followed in their regular order, and there is no occasion to deviate in this case from the proceeding in any other case. Gentlemen on the other side who are in favor of this amendment can move to instruct the conferees to accept the amendment, or if they want to throw it back into the House, there is a very easy way of doing that.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I think I have a fair knowledge of the method of procedure. Strictly following the rules, this bill should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That committee should consider the amendments and report the bill back to the House. It would then go to the Union Calendar, de novo, and each of the amendments could be considered. The only other way to get around that is by unanimous consent or by the Committee on Rules bringing in a rule putting it in conference. In answer to my friend's suggestion about a motion to instruct, I know it is in order to instruct the conferees before they are named, but it has always been held to be rather discourteous to the other body to appoint conferees and instruct them before they ever have a conference.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In this instance, if we accept their amendment here we could not be discourteous.

Mr. CRISP. Oh, if we are going to accept the amendment, in that case I would see no discourtesy to them.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the request made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] would not rank high on the courtesy test, but the fact is that when the House sends a message to the Senate notifying them of the conference, that message does not contain any statement as to whether or not the conferees are instructed.

Mr. CRISP. I think it would be more courteous to the other body for the House to have a direct vote on these matters, and if the House accepts them, then when the conferees meet with the conferees of the Senate those matters would be eliminated and be out of their jurisdiction.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, may I say this to the gentleman from Indiana: This matter, boiled down to a plain proposition, amounts to this: There are a great many Members of the House who wish to have an opportunity to vote on these particular amendments to which the gentleman from Texas has referred. It is a very easy proposition to give every Member of the House that opportunity, if the gentleman will simply agree to the proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]; but if that is not done, it can be properly claimed by those Members that the proposition is simply to give the conferees a chance to tie the House and prevent them from having the opportunity to express themselves, which belongs to them if they want it.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. I hope gentlemen on that side have not lost all their confidence in the gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol; and, having that confidence, they can depend upon it that there will be no agreement on these amendments. I know two of the conferees who will be upon the Senate side. One of them will never recede with reference to the tax amendment. Another, the author of this other amendment, will be one of the conferees. Does the gentleman think that he is going to consent to recede and thus despoil all of his purpose in introducing it, in rehabilitating himself with his constituency? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Indiana that he is certain it will come back with an opportunity for the House to express itself, why does he not agree that he will say to the conferees on the part of the Senate, "I have agreed to take these amendments back, and must take them back?" Why will not the gentleman agree to make that statement to the conferees?

Mr. WOOD. Why will not the gentleman from Texas agree to take my assurance that he can depend upon his friends on the other side?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Ah, I am not depending upon the friends on the other side of the Capitol. I am depending upon the agreement that I can get out of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I think the RECORD ought to show distinctly that which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], the gentleman from Texas

[Mr. GARNER], and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] know full well—that all they have to do to get an expression from the House is to permit this consent to be granted, let the bill be sent to conference, and then, before the conferees are appointed, make such motion as they desire to instruct the conferees, and upon that they can have a debate; and they can have a roll-call vote; and that is the way to instruct the conferees. It can easily be done, and the gentlemen can get the votes they want.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] has been the great dry leader of the House, so heralded to the country. Is it the purposes of the gentleman from Michigan to move to instruct the conferees, if that is done? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRAMTON. I say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I am not one of those who are swayed in the spending of the people's money by a wave of political hysteria. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And if the gentleman will yield, I say to the gentleman from Tennessee that if that distinguished dry from Michigan does not do it this wet will.

Mr. CRAMTON. The House can well understand what kind of a Senate amendment this is when the chief sponsorship of it goes to the hands of one of the most capable and most active wets in the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Because we have got you on the run; that is why.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Is the gentleman afraid to have a vote on this question to-day?

Mr. WOOD. It depends entirely upon the action of this body whether there will be a vote on this matter to-day. All I am asking is that this bill take its regular course in its regular way.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. CELLER. Why does the gentleman object to a vote on the bill to-day, and why does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] object to it?

Mr. WOOD. He is not objecting to it, and we have told you time and time again how we would get a vote on it to-day.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would welcome a vote on it to-day, but the gentlemen on the gentleman's side of the House are trying to put it off for a week or two.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. WOOD. There is one unanimous-consent request pending now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether he can recognize the gentleman from Texas to make a unanimous-consent request while another unanimous-consent request is pending.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. That has been done a number of times, Mr. Speaker; it is just a question of whether or not the Speaker desires to give me recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the deficiency bill be taken from the Speaker's table and the Senate amendments be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union immediately.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the deficiency bill be taken from the Speaker's table and the Senate amendments be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I object until the request of the gentleman from Indiana be put to the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is a preferential motion at this time in order?

The SPEAKER. No; it is not. The question is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object until the gentleman gives the assurance asked of him.

Mr. WOOD. I have given all the assurance that is necessary to protect the gentleman from his fears and I have also tried to protect the gentleman from his own folly.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for unanimous consent that we immediately take the bill from the Speaker's table and consider the Senate amendments in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

MRS. THOMAS R. MARSHALL

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following telegram.

The Clerk read as follows:

Members of House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I am deeply grateful to you for your consideration of my welfare in passing a bill granting me a pension and I am also grateful for the manner in which the matter was consummated. May I express my thanks for your confidence and esteem and assure you of my appreciation.

MRS. THOMAS R. MARSHALL.

[Applause.]

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CELLER. I ask recognition on a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post this morning contains a statement to the effect that the Democrats seem to be lined up as a group to put the appropriation over, meaning the appropriation for the additional $24,000,000——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. That is not a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is a question of personal privilege.

Mr. CELLER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it.

RETURN TO THE SENATE OF SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 171

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 32

Res. 171) entitled "Joint resolution granting the consent of Congress to the city of New York to enter upon certain United States property for the purpose of constructing a rapid-transit railway."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. JACOBSTEIN, for one week, on account of illness in his family.

BIRTHDAY OF MAJOR STEDMAN

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, turning to matters less controversial, I wish to call attention to the fact that this is the eighty-eighth anniversary of the birth of our distinguished colleague Major STEDMAN, of North Carolina. [Applause.]

Major STEDMAN is the only Confederate veteran of the Civil War now serving in either House of the Congress. I am certain I express the sentiment of the Members of the House in wishing him many happy returns of the day. [Applause, Members rising.]

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, January 30, 1929

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who art above all, yet in all, who knowest our need of Thee, since Thou hast placed it there, and who knowest our desire for Thee, since Thou understandest our inmost thoughts, send us forth to meet the challenge of this day conscious of our fellowship with Thee, who hast made us in Thine image. Fill our hearts with thankfulness for the gift of life with its great adventure, its golden opportunity, its zeal, its triumphs, its failures that quicken us, its pain and sorrow that chasten and ennoble us. Help us to drink to the full of the beauty and strength of the world, knowing that they come from Thee as gifts of love to us. Make us aware of life ablaze with the presence of God, and above all give us the mind of Him who reveals the majesty of every common task and sheds the light of heaven upon our path, Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

RESALE PRICE MAINTENANCE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting a report of that commission on Resale Price Maintenance, being volume 1, General Economic and Legal Aspects, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

INAUGURATION ARRANGEMENTS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 386) to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the presidential inaugural ceremonies in 1929.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the Senate already has passed Senate Joint Resolution 198, providing for certain inaugural arrangements, and the House also has passed the same joint resolution. Therefore I move that House Joint Resolution 386 be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following cablegram, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions:

SAN JUAN, P. R. (VIA HAITI), January 29, 1929.

SENATE, Washington, D. C.:

Association Portorriquena Mujeres Suffragistas earnestly request passage bill now before Senate amending our organic law granting Porto Rican women electoral franchise.

ANA VELEZ, President.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

A concurrent resolution memorializing the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States that it is the sense of the members of the Minnesota Legislature that an adequate agricultural tariff be enacted at the earliest possible date

Whereas the prices of agricultural commodities are not on a parity with prices of other products, and especially with the prices of those commodities which farmers must buy; and

Whereas there are competitive agricultural products imported that represent the product of 1,000,000 American farms; and

Whereas these importations are directly depressing the prices of farm crops: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota (the Senate concurring), That we favor the readjustment of tariff schedules affecting agricultural commodities so that the American farmer will be placed on a parity with those engaged in other industries and which will insure for him the full benefit of the American market for his products and will give him the average cost of production based on American standards of living; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge action on this matter in the present session of Congress or in a special session to be called for the consideration of emergency agricultural tariff and general agricultural relief legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Minnesota be instructed to send a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, President-elect Herbert Hoover, the Speaker of the House, the Vice President of the United States, to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, and to each Member in Congress from the State of Minnesota.

JOHN A. JOHNSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
W. I. NOLAN,
President of the Senate.

Passed the house of representatives on the 22d day of January, 1929.

JOHN I. LEVIN,
Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Passed the senate on the 23d day of January, 1929.

A. H. SPAETH,
Secretary of the Senate.

Approved: January 25, 1929.

THEODORE CHRISTIANSON,
Governor of the State of Minnesota.

Filed: January 26, 1929.

MIKE HOLM, Secretary of State.

Mr. OVERMAN presented a memorial signed by members of the New Garden Meeting of Friends, of Guilford College, N. C., which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures, as follows:

NEW GARDEN MEETING OF FRIENDS,
Guilford College, N. C., January 27, 1929.

United States Senator OVERMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR OVERMAN: We wish to express to you our sincere thanks and deep appreciation for your vote to ratify the Briand-Kellogg peace treaty. To outlaw war is of vast international significance and will mean much for the safety of the future. We also wish you to know that we do not favor the passage of the cruiser bill. The building of 15 additional 10,000-ton cruisers is neither consistent with the peace pact or with our needed national policy of economy.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I present a telegram from Mrs. Robert B. Sturkie, department president of the American Legion Auxiliary of Florida, relative to the cruiser bill, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DADE CITY, FLA.

Senator D. U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.:

American Legion Auxiliary of Florida, representing 3,600 members, solicit your support and aid in passing without amendment the cruiser bill and urge you to prevent filibuster.

Mrs. ROBERT B. STURKIE,
Department President.

Mr. PHIPPS presented letters and telegrams in the nature of petitions from the Colorado State legislative chairman, American Legion Auxiliary; the American Legion Auxiliary posts at Hotchkiss, Greeley, Fort Morgan, Paonia, Brush, Durango, Johnstown, and Boulder; the Colorado Commandery of the Loyal Legion; the Colorado State board of the National Society of Daughters of the American Revolution; the Veterans of Foreign Wars; the American Legion; and Disabled American Veterans at Fort Lyon, all in the State of Colorado, praying for the prompt passage of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the New York State League of Savings and Loan Associations, favoring the passage of the bill (H. R. 13981) to permit the United States to be made a party to actions to foreclose mortgages or other actions in respect to real estate, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, recently one of the great farm organization groups, the American Farm Bureau Federation, held its tenth annual meeting in Chicago. In view of the expected special session of Congress to deal with the farm problem, I believe it would be worth while for Congress and the country to study carefully the resolutions on the subject of farm legislation adopted by the federation at that meeting, and I ask unanimous consent that these resolutions be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions of the American Farm Bureau Federation at the tenth annual meeting, Chicago, Ill., December 12, 1928

In celebrating the tenth year of activity of the American Farm Bureau Federation it is appropriate to renew our declaration of principles, which was adopted at the beginning of our organization, in these words:

"We pledge ourselves to carry out the objects of the American Farm Bureau Federation, which are to develop, strengthen, and correlate the work of the State farm bureau federations; to encourage and promote cooperation of representative agricultural organizations in every effort to improve facilities and conditions for economic and efficient production, conservation, marketing, transportation, and distribution of farm products; to further the study and enactment of constructive agricultural legislation; to advise with representatives of the public agricultural institutions cooperating with the Farm Bureau in the determination of nation-wide policies; and to inform Farm Bureau members regarding all movements that affect their interests."

For 10 years this organization has devoted itself to the solution of economic issues which relate directly to profit on the American farms. In spite of the rapid shifting of economic factors during the last 10 years, the American Farm Bureau Federation has not adopted policies in haste and consequently has not found it necessary to reverse its principles. Without hesitation the principles contained in each resolution of former annual sessions are hereby referred to and approved and are declared to be in full force and effect, unless they have been retired by accomplishment.

II. NATIONAL POLICY FOR AGRICULTURE

The control of agricultural surpluses is the dominant economic question which faces us at the present time. This problem has become a national issue and is not of concern alone to agriculture.

We reiterate the principles for which we have striven in the past to remove the effects of surpluses which, by imposing upon us a world price rather than an American price, and by making the tariff largely without benefit to the producers of farm crops, have in the past and will in the future, if continued, make it impossible to maintain the American standard of living upon our farms.

The questions of surplus control, seasonal and otherwise, for their proper solution require that the entire crop be brought under the regulation of efficient marketing and distribution which is too great a task for our present cooperative commodity marketing associations of themselves to accomplish. Failures in cooperative marketing have occurred mostly because it has proven to be difficult and in most cases impossible to acquire control of the whole crop. This has resulted in a small part of the crop, produced by a small fraction of the total producers, being required to bear the burden of surplus control and distribution for the entire production; and has made it impossible to require all portions of the crop to share in the cost of bringing the crop into the American protective system. Tariffs on farm crops, however, are not substitutes for surplus control legislation, and are partially ineffective on crops which produce surpluses. Neither does acreage regulation, by governmental mandate or by voluntary agreement, guarantee control of surplus.

Legislation must be adopted to make the tariff effective on surplus producing crops using cooperative marketing associations as the instruments for marketing not only the surplus but all portions of our farm crops; and containing definite checks and penalties upon overproduction. This legislation must be of a nature which does not subsidize agriculture.

It is recognized generally that surplus control legislation and agricultural tariffs are companion measures each exerting a long-time influence. Emergency action upon either measure is not sought by us since a national policy for agriculture can not be founded on emergency treatments. These measures are inseparable and can not be made major features of the second session of the Seventieth Congress since time is not available in a short session of Congress adequately to correlate and dispose of these subjects in the proper manner. Both such major legislative projects should be considered at an extra session of the Seventy-first Congress which we confidently expect will be called soon after the adjournment of the Seventieth Congress. In this we are given assurance by the promise of our President elect who said: "So far as my own abilities may be of service, I dedicate them to help secure prosperity and contentment in that industry where I and my forefathers were born and nearly all my family still obtain their livelihood."

We devotedly are seeking to solve these problems as a basis upon which our national agricultural policy may be founded. While we have seen nothing up to this time which would cause us to recede from our former position, we are willing to compare legislation which has received our support in the past with that proposed by any other organization. We are also willing to consider these subjects with the forthcoming national administration from time to time to find, if possible, a better way than we have heretofore supported, of effectuating adequate control of agricultural surpluses, of protecting and advancing cooperative commodity marketing, and of establishing on our farms the benefits of the American protective system, all of which secure that American standard of living which agriculture and industry alike desire.

III. MUSCLE SHOALS

We continue our support of the principles contained in the bill bearing the name of the late Congressman Martin B. Madden, of Illinois, which provides for the full-time capacity operation of the Muscle Shoals project by a lessee who is obligated to fix atmospheric nitrogen and manufacture and distribute it in the form of highly concentrated fertilizers at a profit limitation of 8 per cent, using the power at Muscle Shoals for the above purposes.

IV. TAXATION

The American Farm Bureau Federation enunciated 10 years ago a foundation upon which Federal taxation now stands. Time has proven the effectiveness of our Federal-tax principles in both the amount of money secured and the ease of its collection from those who have ability to pay and who pay in proportion to earning power.

We recommend that the principles of Federal tax which we uphold be extended as much as is possible into State and local tax structures. To this end we authorize President Thompson to call a conference of delegates sent by our various State farm bureau federations, at their expense, for the specific purpose of correlating various tax programs for State and local governments and formulating a unified project in these matters.

V. NEW PROJECTS

We recommend that—

(a) The Federal seed act be amended to designate by certification and otherwise the State or region of origin of domestic seeds and the date of the germination test with its per cent of viability. We recommend that the handling of such seeds be conducted by producer and consumer organizations, dealing directly with one another.

(b) Engineering experiment stations be established in connection with the land-grant colleges.

(c) No propaganda of private interests be permitted in our tax-supported schools, from the kindergarten to the university, inclusive.

(d) No new reclamation areas be brought under cultivation at the present time, and that the Bureau of Reclamation be transferred to the United States Department of Agriculture, so that correlation may be had between the bringing in of new productive areas and the demand for additional farm crops.

(e) Federal regulation of motor busses and trucks qualifying as common carriers and doing interstate business be secured.

(f) A study of the possibilities of cooperative production be made by a committee to be appointed by the president of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

(g) Cooperative crop insurance be more actively used as a method to reduce farm losses.

(h) Codes of ethics for various groups should not be used for the purpose of concealing price-fixing schemes and breaking down the anti-trust act.

(i) A uniform traffic code on Federal highways be promulgated by national legislation.

(j) Any effort to promote world peace be commended.

(k) There be established a national institute of health.

(l) Instruction in maternity and infancy matters be promulgated by the Federal Government.

(m) The transportation act be so amended that the shipping public will be equitably represented on any board giving consideration to wage questions.

(n) Corn sugar to be given its rightful place in the trade practices of the Nation, and so provide an increased market for one of our staple crops.

(o) The Federal Reserve Board be given authority to use its power and influence to stabilize the purchasing power of money.

(p) Correspondence schools which do an interstate business should be regulated by Federal Government.

(q) The request for a congressional investigation of the recent administration of the farm-loan system by the State federations representing the northeast portion of our Nation be granted.

(r) Broadcasting stations which specialize in farm programs be given equal consideration by the Radio Commission with those stations which broadcast commercial programs.

VI. OLD PROJECTS

We reannounce our position in support of—

(a) Rural electrification.

(b) Farm-fire prevention.

(c) Opposition to retail-price fixing.

(d) A continuation of the inquiry by the Federal Trade Commission of public-utilities corporations.

(e) Forest preservation and reforestation of barren and marginal lands.

(f) Control of European corn borer.

(g) Control or eradication of plant and animal pests and diseases.

(h) Fundamental research in agriculture by Federal, State, and citizen organizations.

(i) Federal aid for highways with special attention given to expanding this aid to farm-to-market highways.

(j) Adequate funds for the United States Department of Agriculture, the Tariff Commission, Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Federal Trade Commission.

(k) The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence route.

(l) The inland river transportation systems.

(m) Toll bridges reverting to the Government at the end of a definite period.

(n) The Hoch-Smith resolution.

(o) An American merchant marine directed by the United States Shipping Board and operated without subsidy.

(p) Rapid and continuous operations to control floods of our rivers.

(q) Retention of the Pullman surcharge.

(r) Parcel-post rates which are equitably proportioned to rates on other classes of mail.

(s) All quarantine orders which have for their purpose the preservation of health or the safeguarding of a domestic industry by preventing the importation of harmful plant and animal pests and diseases and by stamping out such pests and diseases wherever they appear in our Nation.

(t) The investigation by Congress relative to quotas of nationals from the Western Hemisphere, and ask that it be hastened, so that final adjustments may be made by those in all parts of our Nation who use seasonal labor.

(u) The main principles which we desire to have incorporated in the following measures at Washington, which have already made progress and constitutes a program of unfinished business for the short session of the Seventieth Congress:

(1) Foreign service abroad for United States Department of Agriculture (S. 1178; H. R. 11074).

(2) Farm loan amendments (S. 3241, S. 3684, S. 4175).

(3) Agricultural and decennial census (H. R. 393).

(4) Vocational training (S. 1731; H. R. 12241).

(10) Defining lobbyists and lobbying (S. 1095).

(11) "Lame duck" resolution (S. J. Res. 47).

(12) Protein standards (S. 3367; H. R. 106).

(13) Trade-marking the name Farm Bureau (H. R. 13109).

(14) Postal policy bill (H. R. 89).

(15) Special export rate on grain (S. J. Res. 67).

(16) Truth in fabrics (S. 1621; H. R. 7907).

(17) Regulation of produce marketing (S. 1294).

(18) Amendment to section 5219, Revised Statutes of United States.

VII. TARIFF

The crises of the last 10 years have brought all citizens to realize that agriculture in our Nation is facing conditions similar to those which existed in England when the corn laws were repealed, since which time farmers in that country have striven against insurmountable odds. Tariffs are international issues and have for farmers in the United States constantly increasing world-wide significance. International loans by a creditor nation such as ours has come to be contain no promise of benefit to agriculture. If our money is marketed abroad, the unavoidable conclusion must be that repayment will be made largely by the importation into our Nation of agricultural commodities.

Our home market is always our best market, both for agriculture and industry, whether the commodity marketed is money or the products of the factory and the farm. This market must be held inviolate for the benefit of our own citizens.

Rates of duty on foreign-grown farm commodities which seek markets in our country must be adequate to permit our farmers to enjoy that profit which guarantees the American standard of living. Various commodities which are directly or indirectly competitive with our domestic farm crops should carry high rates of duty. The rates of duty should be based on the value of farm crops to the American producers thereof and should be of such nature that as the value increases the rate of duty automatically will increase.

It is indispensably necessary that flexibility be provided in tariff rates no matter how accurately such rates may be estimated in the writing of a tariff act. Economic conditions change, which require an elasticity which will permit corresponding changes in the rates of duty. There must be continuously in the Federal Government a tariff commission under the administration of which this elasticity can be secured. This commission should be nonpartisan and the members thereof should be appointed for such a term of years as will give continuity in the carrying out of the policies of our tariff laws and will secure eventually scientific and economic revision of tariff rates rather than revision of a political nature which has been up to the present time too much in evidence.

VIII. RELATIONSHIPS

The Good Book says: "In the multitude of counselors there is safety."

This truth has been carefully adhered to during the decade of history which measures the life of the American Farm Bureau Federation. Our officers and representatives have always been ready to counsel with, profit from, and give accord to the spokesmen of all other farm organizations. We are particularly mindful of cordial relationships which we have maintained with all cooperative-marketing organizations and the nation-wide membership organizations similar to the farm bureau. The wisdom and counsel of our brother officials who represent contemporary farm organizations have always been a stimulus to us, and we trust our advice has been received by them as sincerely as it has been given by us.

We realize that farm policies can not be formulated merely from an exchange of opinions but must be the result of careful thinking of those who live in the open country. Any organization may accumulate a mass of opinions in a short while, but it requires time and patient thought to evolve a policy. Existence of opinions and even of facts is of trivial importance to us unless such opinions and facts are interpreted from the point of view of agriculture.

It is our continuing desire to compare our policies and our interpretations thereof with those of other farm organizations.

The existence of facts is one thing; the organization and interpretations of facts is quite another thing. Each major industry has found it necessary to organize and interpret available facts according to its respective needs. Agriculture is no exception to this rule. It is upon this basis that we invite the cooperation of all other organizations in our Nation.

IX. THE SUGAR INDUSTRY

We urge that the situation regarding entry of sugar into the United States be brought to the attention of Members of Congress without delay, and we respectfully ask them to use their best efforts to place a limit on the free entry of sugar from the Philippines and Porto Rico to a point which will guarantee reasonable protection to the United States sugar industry, and that the tariff rate against all foreign sugar be increased so as to give adequate protection to this great American enterprise.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I present a very important letter from the Director of the Census, which requires a brief explanatory statement.

In connection with pending reapportionment legislation, the action of the House of Representatives and of the Senate Committee on Commerce has indorsed the so-called "method of major fractions" as the method for handling remainders. In academic detail the accurate description of "major fractions" on the one hand and so-called "equal proportions" on the other hand is highly technical. But underlying this mathematical consideration is a general, constitutional consideration involving the objective to be reached and this must be decided before the discussion is diverted to methods. Senators have been receiving letters from mathematicians and scientists indorsing "equal proportions" as against "major fractions" and complaining against my general statement of the difference between them.

My statement referred to the objective rather than to the method. I repeat it:

"Major fractions" reapportions remainders absolutely on the straight basis of population without preferences for any State on account of its size. "Equal proportions" reapportions remainders on the basis of a ratio between the given remainder in any given State and the total population in that State.

I have asked the Director of the Census to pass upon this definition. He states that I am correct in suggesting the fundamental difference. He states also that a complete definition requires added technical detail. To supply this detail, I ask unanimous consent that the letter of the Director of the Census and the statement referred to by him may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered

The letter and statement are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, January 29, 1929

Hon. A. H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your letter of January 28, I do not believe that it is possible to formulate any better brief and accurate definition of the essential features of the two methods of apportionment—that of "major fractions" and that of "equal proportions" than is contained on page 73 of the hearings before the House Committee on the Census, held at the second session of the Sixty-ninth Congress, a copy of which is inclosed. According to that statement, which was prepared by Doctor Hill, of this bureau, and approved by Doctor Willcox, the essential difference in the two methods is that under the method of equal proportions the deviations from an exact apportionment are made as small as possible when measured by the relative or percentage difference in either the ratio of population to Representatives or the ratio of Representatives to population, while under the method of major fractions the deviations are made as small as possible when measured by the absolute or subtraction difference in the ratio of Representatives to population.

As regards your interpretation of these terms, as given in your letter, while I think that it suggests the fundamental difference in the methods of approaching the problem, I do not believe that the advocates of either of the methods would accept it as an accurate or complete definition without some qualifications.

I confess that to me the matter seems so technical that I doubt whether it can be explained briefly and completely in nonmathematical terms.

Very truly yours, W. M. STEUART, Director.

The statement referred to follows:

[Statement prepared for Representative JACOBSTEIN by Dr. Joseph A. Hill, Assistant Director of the Census Bureau, approved by Dr. Walter F. Willcox]

THE ESSENTIAL FEATURES OF THE TWO METHODS

On account of fractions or remainders in the exact quotas a mathematically exact apportionment according to population is impossible. That being the case, the aim should be to make an apportionment in which the necessary deviations from a mathematically exact apportionment shall be as small as possible.

Two methods of accomplishing that result are under consideration—one the method of equal proportions and the other the method of major fractions.

METHOD OF EQUAL PROPORTIONS

Process followed:

(1) In making an apportionment by the method of equal proportions the first step is to assign one Representative to each State, thus fulfilling the requirement of the Constitution that each State shall have at least one Representative. This disposes of 48 Representatives.

(2) The next step is to divide the population of each State by the following quantities in succession: $\sqrt{1\times2}$, $\sqrt{2\times3}$, $\sqrt{3\times4}$, etc.

(3) The quotients thereby obtained are arranged in order of size, beginning with the largest, to form what is called a priority list, which indicates the order in which Representatives in excess of 48 shall be given out to the States. Representatives are then assigned in that order until the required number has been given out.

The above process produces a result in which the necessary deviations from exactness are as small as possible when measured by the relative or percentage difference in either the ratio of population to Representatives or the ratio of Representatives to population.

METHOD OF MAJOR FRACTIONS

Process followed:

(1) Here, as in the method of equal proportions, the first step is to assign one Representative to each State, making 48 in all.

(2) The next step is to divide the population of each State by the following quantities in succession: 1½, 2½, 3½, etc.

(3) The quotients thereby obtained are then arranged in order of size beginning with the largest and continuing the process until the total number of quotients plus 48 is one greater than the number of Representatives to be apportioned.

(4) The next step is to divide the population of the several States by a number midway between the last two quotients in the list.

(5) The last step is to assign to each State a number of Representatives equal to the whole number in the quotient which was obtained for that State by the above division plus one more Representative in case the quotient contains a major fraction.

This process gives a result in which the necessary deviations from exactness are as small as possible when measured by the absolute or subtraction difference in the ratio of representatives to population.

THE ESSENTIAL DIFFERENCE

It is evident, then, that the essential difference in the two methods is in the mode or method of measuring deviations or divergences from exactness, the method of equal proportions using as a measure the relative or percentage difference in either of the ratios, while the method of major fractions uses the absolute or subtraction difference in the ratio of Representatives to population.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, since the beginning of the debate on the cruiser bill persistent representations have been made, both inside and outside of the Senate, to the effect that the Navy Department had not presented to the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate correct and accurate statements in regard to the real strength of the American Navy, the comparative strength of the American Navy with the navy of Great Britain, and other naval statistics that have been used in the Senate by the proponents of the cruiser bill.

When these representations, emanating from several sources, were made to me, I requested Mrs. Laura P. Morgan, associate secretary of the National Council for the Prevention of War, to submit to me in writing a summary of the reasons her particular organization had for challenging the accuracy of the Navy Department comparison statistics in certain particulars. In accordance with this request Mrs. Morgan prepared and delivered to me a comprehensive statement setting forth the statistics on these points and the conclusions therefrom which the National Council for the Prevention of War have offered to the American public as a basis for their point of view in opposition to the cruiser bill.

After receiving the above-mentioned statement I transmitted Mrs. Morgan's memoranda, with her consent, direct to the Navy Department, with the request that some statement be made by the responsible authority of that department, either agreeing with or dissenting from the statement of facts and statistics set forth by the National Council for the Prevention of War.

In due course I received a detailed memoranda from the department signed by Rear Admiral Frank H. Schofield, in which the Navy Department took issue, point by point, with the arguments contained in Mrs. Morgan's original statement to me. Thereupon Mrs. Morgan made a reply to the naval memoranda.

Without drawing any conclusion from this correspondence, I am requesting, at the instance of Mrs. Morgan, that it be printed in the RECORD, for I believe this correspondence for the first time sets forth succinctly some of the conflicts between the statistical claims of the respective schools now contending for and against the passage of the cruiser bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The correspondence is as follows:

ORIGINAL STATEMENT

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 10, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At your request I am submitting to you some facts and figures which will show that certain statements made by the Navy Department, however accurate they may be so far as they go, are entirely misleading and even deceptive because of the factors which they neglect.

1. My first point is made with reference to the tables giving the number of ships laid down by the various naval powers since February 6, 1922, the date of the Washington conference. My contention is that by limiting the consideration to those ships which were laid down since that time, taking no account whatever of the ships under construction, a totally incorrect picture of the situation is given. By using this method and properly choosing the arbitrary dates for beginning and ending the period of comparison it would be possible to prove anything.

For example, the table inserted in the RECORD of January 3, 1929, by Senator HALE (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 1059–1060) gives the number of vessels laid down by the United States since the armistice as 19, whereas the number of vessels laid down by the British Empire is 55. If we confine our comparisons to the first six classes of ships—namely, battleships, aircraft carriers, cruisers, mine layers, destroyers, and submarines, the so-called combatant classes—this table shows that the United States in this period has laid down 13 ships with a tonnage of 154,200, whereas the British Empire has laid down 46 ships with a tonnage of 295,690.

On the other hand, if instead of this period we choose the period from the armistice to the Washington conference, we find that beginning with the year 1919 the United States laid down 4 capital ships, 8 cruisers, 77 destroyers, and 27 submarines, or a total of 116 ships of 312,586 tonnage. The British Empire, according to tables furnished by the United States Navy Department, laid down in that time only one fleet submarine of 2,525 tonnage, and no ship whatever in the other five classes. Taking then the ships laid down beginning with the year 1919 to the present date in these classes we find that the United States has a total of 127 ships with 400,786 tonnage, whereas the British have a total of only 47 ships with 298,215 tonnage.

I am citing these figures, not for the purpose of showing that the United States has been building on the whole more than the British—for, of course, the British had a very large navy at the time of the armistice—nor to criticize this building policy, but simply and solely to illustrate my point that this table used by Senator HALE proves nothing.

Nor is it valid to use this table as proof of the intention of the United States to limit her Navy and that of the British Empire to increase hers, unless we consider what has been the state of building during the previous period. Is it not, for instance, natural that the British should begin to build after a three or four year period, during which one submarine was the only combatant ship laid down? The same argument as to intent could be equally well used for the period after the armistice, as, indeed, it was used by Commander Bellairs in the House of Commons on November 24, 1927.

Commander Bellairs made the following statement:

"The four chief navies of the world, from the armistice up to 1923, laid down 310 war ships of all kinds, and our contribution to that total was only 11 to the others' 299."

In reply to this Mr. Lees-Smith, of the Labor Party, called his attention to the fact that these figures took no account whatever of the vessels which were building and even were on the verge of completion on the day the armistice was signed, but only reckoned the vessels that were laid down since the armistice. Mr. Lees-Smith continued:

"If you take the number of vessels on the way to completion at the armistice and reckon those in the account, the figure of 11 rises to a figure of nearly 400. The honorable and gallant member's calculations are out of reckoning by about 4,000 per cent.

"What I am indicating to the House is that statistics can prove anything. Statistics which take into account only 11 vessels laid down after the armistice and miss out the 400 which were being completed at the armistice, including the Hood, are entirely meaningless for any practical purpose."

To this Commander Bellairs replied:

"But we are dealing with a state of mind prevailing after the armistice and whether it is a peace mind or a war mind."

A similar stafement was made by Admiral McNamee in a public speech at the Women's Democratic Club on December 17, 1928, when he said:

"The United States has not laid down and completed a single cruiser since the Washington conference, whereas the British Empire has laid down and completed seven such cruisers."

Admiral McNamee did not add to his statement until questioned that during this period the United States has had under construction 18 modern cruisers, and when challenged replied merely that his figures were strictly accurate.

I maintain that such a statement as this proves nothing—except perhaps that the British shipbuilders can turn out cruisers more quickly than the American shipbuilders—and that the only purpose it serves is to obscure the truth.

When a similar table showing vessels laid down since the Washington conference was presented at the hearing before the House Naval Appropriations Subcommittee last February, Mr. FRENCH, chairman of the committee, pointed out that it was necessary to take into account that the United States had added two new battleships to our capital ships since the conference, the Colorado and the West Virginia, at a tonnage for the two of 65,200. (House hearings, Navy Department appropriation bill for 1929, pp. 157–158.) These ships were laid down in 1919 and 1920, respectively, and were therefore under construction at the time of the conference. The United States also had under construction ten 7,500-ton cruisers which were laid down, 2 in 1918 and 8 in 1920.

Mr. FRENCH also believed that the tables should be clarified with respect to the Nelson and the Rodney, two British battleships which were provided for by the Washington conference as replacement ships, to take the place of four ships which went out of commission when they came in. Mr. FRENCH'S point was that the tonnage of these two ships should not be counted as new tonnage added to the fleet, or at least only that part of their tonnage which is over and above the tonnage of the four ships which they replaced.

While discussing this table, Mr. FRENCH asked Admiral Hughes with regard to the policy of the nations that are parties to the Washington treaty "what he would say as to the respect other nations are paying to the treaty in its observance." Admiral Hughes answered:

"So far as I know it has been strictly observed."

If we consider building as indicating a state of mind, it should also be pointed out that since the Geneva conference of 1927 the British have dropped three cruisers from their building program; and it has been announced by Mr. Bridgeman, first lord of the Admiralty, at least twice in the House of Commons that they would build no more of the class A cruiser—that is, 10,000-ton, 8-inch gun—until the United States caught up, provided there was a chance of an agreement to build no more such cruisers. He said that for the present they were holding in abeyance the building of such cruisers to see if the United States would not reconsider this point.

II. The second point that I wish to make is with respect to parity between the United States and the British Navies as expressed in terms of numbers and tonnage, or, in other words "mathematical" parity. My contention is that, taking all classes of ships, the figures justify the statement of President Coolidge, which was made in his annual message in Congress December 7, 1926, when he said:

"Only one navy approaches ours, and none surpasses it."

No change has been made in the British naval policy since that time. On the contrary, the British cruiser program, which has led to the claim that she has violated the spirit of the treaty, was adopted in August, 1925, and instead of being increased since then it has already been curtailed by three cruisers and may be reduced further. Her published cruiser-building program extends only through the year 1929.

A table of total numbers and tonnage follows.

To discuss "mathematical" parity, it is necessary to take into consideration not only cruisers but the five main classes of ships, battleships, aircraft carriers, cruisers, destroyers, and submarines. The first two classes were limited by the Washington treaty. Of the three classes unlimited by that treaty—submarines, destroyers, and cruisers—the United States is superior in the first two. The British Empire is superior in cruisers.

In capital ships the Washington treaty gave the British a slight superiority in tonnage and numbers in order to make up for the fact that her battleship fleet, on the whole, was older and weaker than ours. The United States Fleet has six battleships completed since the war, whereas the British have only three, the Nelson, Rodney, and Hood. Moreover, the modernization of eight of our older battleships, including elevation of guns, will add vastly to the strength of our battleship fleet.

Aircraft carriers were limited by the treaty, but no nation has built up to the limit. The British have the advantage in numbers and tonnage, but more than half of this is pretreaty tonnage and classed as experimental. The Lexington and the Saratoga, combined cruisers and aircraft carriers, are the only vessels in this class that were laid down since the war. They also have a tremendous advantage in speed and in capacity for aircraft. Hector Bywater, the English Navy critic, says that the 6 British carriers were all launched from 9 to 12 years ago and that their combined transport capacity is 160 planes. The capacity of the Lexington and Saratoga is 75 planes each.

In aircraft itself I understand that the United States has a distinct superiority over Great Britain, but I have not looked up the statistics on that point.

In destroyers and submarines the United States Navy is so far superior to the British Navy, as is shown by the tables at the end, that it is not necessary to discuss these classes in detail. In cruisers the British Empire is superior, but not to the extent that is implied by the tables presented by Senator HALE without a careful examination.

Senator HALE'S table includes eight cruisers which last year the Navy Department tables classed as second-line cruisers, and two of them are already on the disposal list. Hector Bywater in an article in the Nineteenth Century Magazine for March, 1928, speaks of these as "obsolete vessels soon to be placed on the disposal list." There is also some doubt as to whether the two 8,300-ton cruisers listed as appropriated for will actually be built. Besides these obsolete cruisers, the British list contains 33 that are under 5,000 tons. Of these Mr. Bywater says:

"Useful enough as fleet scouts or destroyer leaders, they are not suitable for patrol duty on the ocean routes. Twenty of them were completed during the war, and the arduous service they saw in the North Sea has seriously curtailed their period of effective life. At least a dozen are obsolescent already."

Mr. Bywater gives Great Britain's cruisers, omitting the obsolete vessels, as 50, "built, building, or ordered," instead of the 64 listed in Senator HALE'S tables.

There is apparently a constant change in naval policy with regard to the designation "first line" and "second line." As late as last winter Secretary Wilbur, appearing before the House Appropriations Committee, gave 15 years as the effective life assigned to a cruiser by the General Board of the Navy, after which it becomes second line. Tables furnished by the Navy Department up to that time have made the same classification, but Senator HALE has this year included all cruisers under 20 years as first line, explaining that this was an agreement tentatively reached at the Geneva Naval Conference. However, it has been repeatedly stated heretofore that the United States delegates refused to be bound by any agreement so long as agreement was not reached on all points, including the limitation of cruiser strength. I have been unable to discover whether the limit of 20 years for first-line cruisers has been officially adopted or not. It seems rather significant that this classification includes all the British obsolete vessels as first-line cruisers, while excluding all the United States obsolete vessels.

It is now being argued that the proposed 15 cruisers are to replace our 22 obsolete and second-line cruisers, but as late as two years ago these cruisers were not even included in the tables put out by the Navy Department. All but five of them have been out of commission for years and these five have been in noncombatant service.

Secretary Wilbur in a speech on February 13, 1928, to the Indianapolis Association of Credit Men said:

"The Washington conference by ignoring these older cruisers inferentially declared them obsolete and useless from a military standpoint."

The inference is inescapable that if these cruisers were obsolete and ignored at the time of the Washington conference, they are only being brought forward now in order to back up the argument of replacement. Are they not, in fact, being replaced by the cruisers built and building since the Washington conference?

Representative Butler, chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee last year when the cruiser bill was being debated on the floor of the House, said that this was the first time that he had heard of this as a replacement program.

Taking into consideration only the total numbers and tonnage of the various classes of ships in the two navies, first and second line, we have the following table compiled from figures taken from Navy Department tables as of October 1, 1928:

	United States		Great Britain
	Number	Tonnage	Number	Tonnage
Capital ships	18	525,850	20	556,350
Airplane carriers	3	78,700	6	107,550
Submarines	124	92,979	74	75,425
Destroyers [1]	295	340,994	187	230,470
Cruisers	40	334,425	64	397,140
Mine layers	18	32,770	2	11,810
Monitors			4	28,820
Total	498	1,405,718	357	1,407,565

[1] 25 of these destroyers are now detailed with the Coast Guard.

Since 3 British ships, 2 cruisers and 1 mine layer, with a tonnage of 15,720, are on the disposal list, it would seem proper to deduct this tonnage from the British total, leaving a total of 354 ships with a tonnage of 1,391,845.

Yours very sincerely,

LAURA PUFFER MORGAN,
Associate Secretary National Council for Prevention of War.

ANSWER

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS,
Washington, January 12, 1929.

Memorandum

Subject: Statistical data concerning naval building programs and naval strengths.

Reference: (a) Letter of Mrs. Laura Puffer Morgan, associate secretary National Council for Prevention of War, dated January 10, 1929, addressed to the Hon. DAVID I. WALSH, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

1. In Mrs. Morgan's letter, reference (a), she states that certain tables presented by Senator HALE and certain statements made by the Navy Department are "entirely misleading, and even deceptive, because of the factors which they neglect." The points covered in Mrs. Morgan's letter are—

(1) The table on page 1 of Navies of the World, prepared by the Hon. FREDERICK HALE, chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, and printed for the use of the Committee on Naval Affairs, 1928, entitled "Total Tonnage of Vessels (by Classes) Laid Down or Appropriated for Since February 6, 1922."

(2) That with respect to parity between the United States and the British Navies as expressed in terms of numbers and tonnage—in other words, mathematical parity—only one navy approaches ours and none surpasses it.

(3) A discussion of the significance of "first-line" and "second-line" ships.

(4) A discussion as to whether the cruiser program is or is not in part a replacement program.

(5) A table inserted at the end of Mrs. Morgan's letter designed to show that there is practical equality of navies as between the United States and Great Britain.

These points will be taken up seriatim.

2. First, as to point (1) above, this table was prepared to show exactly what its heading indicates. Up to the time of the Washington conference there had been no international restraint upon naval building programs; each power had been entirely free to build or not to build as it saw fit. There was no agreement, implied or otherwise, no understanding which hampered the complete freedom of each power to act as it deemed proper. The signing of the Washington treaty created a new condition which differentiated all subsequent naval programs from all preceding naval programs. This table, then, was prepared to indicate the effect which the Washington treaty had on the decisions of the powers signatory to the Washington treaty. The table has no other significance.

3. Mrs. Morgan points out that this table shows that in the principal classes of naval vessels the United States laid down 13 ships with a total tonnage of 154,200, while during the same period the British Empire laid down 46 ships with a total tonnage of 295,690. The ratio of tonnages between Great Britain and the United States given by considering the table as a whole is 1 for the United States and 2.1 for Great Britain, whereas, taking only those ships indicated by Mrs. Morgan, the ratio is 1 for the United States and 1.9 for Great Britain. There is no deception or misrepresentation in this table. The table as published was complete, specific, and designed to furnish the answer to but one question.

4. It is quite true, as Mrs. Morgan states, that you can arrive at other numbers and other totals and at other ratios by asking and answering other questions.

5. On page 3 Mrs. Morgan, in referring to Admiral McNamee's speech before the Women's Democratic Club on December 17, 1928, states that the fact that Great Britain had completed seven 8-inch cruisers since the treaty of Washington and that the United States had not laid down and completed a single cruiser since that conference proves nothing "except perhaps that the British shipbuilders can turn out cruisers more quickly than the American shipbuilders, and that the only purpose it serves is to obscure the truth." Of course, this is an unworthy statement, particularly when joined to it is the fact that the statement, independent of its attack on Admiral McNamee, is itself untrue because of the following fact:

The first American 8-inch cruiser was laid down in 1926, the second in 1927, and the remaining six in 1928. The first British cruiser under the new program was laid down in 1924 and the remaining six of that particular group were laid down in 1924 and 1925, all of them laid down from one to four years prior to the laying down of the eight American cruisers.

Yet Mrs. Morgan states that Admiral McNamee's statement proves nothing "except perhaps that the British shipbuilders can turn out cruisers more quickly than the American shipbuilders."

6. The discussions contained in Mrs. Morgan's letter regarding capital ships are not germane. The question under consideration is the cruiser situation and other types of auxiliary vessels.

7. Mrs. Morgan states "that since the Geneva conference of 1927 the British have dropped three cruisers from their building program, and it has been announced by Mr. Bridgeman, First Lord of the Admiralty, at least twice in the House of Commons that they would build no more of the class A cruisers—that is, 10,000-ton 8-inch gun—until the United States caught up, provided there was a chance of an agreement to build no more such cruisers." It is to be noted that the three cruisers mentioned by Mrs. Morgan were not "dropped" but were "postponed," and that the statement of Mr. Bridgeman did not include a policy concerning the 8,300-ton 8-inch cruisers which are distinctly a part of the British cruiser program.

8. As to point (2), Mrs. Morgan places her opinion against professional opinion regarding naval armaments. After prolonged deliberation at the Washington conference it was decided that the best and most appropriate way of arriving at parity in naval strengths was by considering vessels grouped in certain categories, namely, capital ships, aircraft carriers, and auxiliary combatant vessels. It has been the position of the United States that a further division of naval auxiliary vessels into three classes was necessary as a basis for limitation of armaments, namely, cruisers, destroyers, submarines, because the functions of these three classes of naval combatant vessels are not interchangeable. No one of them can perform the duties of the other class or classes satisfactorily. The lack of interchangeability, for instance, of destroyers and cruisers, was well illustrated when during the World War the British attempted to convoy merchant ships across the North Sea with two destroyers, a convoy was discovered and destroyed by a German light-cruiser division, and the two destroyers doing escort duty were also destroyed. If that convoy had been escorted by cruisers of suitable type it would not have been sunk.

9. As to point (3), comment is made regarding the use of the terms "first line" and "second line" in the tables. These words could very well be omitted from the tables without changing the significance of the tables. The point to be considered is, are the vessels listed suitable vessels, still fit for active service, or are they obsolete and of very limited value? The consensus of professional opinion at the Geneva conference was that cruisers less than 20 years of age should be considered as still fit for active service and should not be subject to replacement in case there were an agreement concerning limitation. It should be noted, however, that the Japanese delegation were inclined toward a shorter life for cruisers, namely, 16 years, while there was a tacit acceptance by both the American and British delegations of 20 years as the useful life for cruisers. There was no formal agreement in this respect, nor was there formal agreement on any other subject at Geneva.

10. There is no deception, no misrepresentation, in the tables given in Mr. HALE'S summary of Navies of the World. All of the pertinent data is given so that each one may sort and sift and classify as he sees fit.

11. As to point (4), the President of the United States has said that the cruiser program is largely a replacement program, and that is the Navy's understanding. It is not wholly a replacement program, because the total tonnage of the new 10,000-ton cruisers proposed up to the present, namely, 230,000 tons, is in excess by some 50,000 tons of the old cruisers that are to be replaced. It is immaterial whether this program be called a replacement program or not; it is a necessary program because the cruisers now in existence, with exception of the 10 Omaha class, have passed beyond the age when they can deliver efficient service. Their ordnance, their speed, and their general usefulness, has become so inferior because of the advent of the new cruiser types that they would be used in war only because of the desperate shortage of other cruisers of more modern types and more warlike capabilities. It would be absurd for the United States to be satisfied with a total cruiser force of 18 cruisers, if she foresaw any possibility whatever of war on the sea. The 15 cruisers proposed are an absolute minimum of requirements—whether they be called replacement cruisers or simply augmentations of the fleet. By the time they are built, if authorized, the 22 obsolete cruisers now carried on our Navy list will have become so antiquated that they will no longer be efficient for use even in desperate emergency.

12. As to point (5), in the table which Mrs. Morgan gives at the end of her letter, it is to be noted that she takes no account of the fact that British submarine tonnage is being largely augmented by new construction where there is no corresponding magnitude of effort in the United States, and where the submarines of the United States are becoming obsolete so fast that even if we undertook now a building program of seven submarines per year, we would not be able to meet the depletions of our submarine forces incident to the rate at which they are reaching the obsolete age.

13. As to cruisers, this table gives the American strength as 40 of a total tonnage of 334,425 tons, against the British 64 of 397,140 tons. In a note Mrs. Morgan proposes to eliminate from the British list of cruisers and minelayers 15,720 tons because they are on the disposal list, but she makes no such proposal regarding the 22 obsolete cruisers which she has previously mentioned in her letter. A just comparison of cruiser strengths would require in the table a reduction of over 179,000 tons from the American cruiser strength in order to make the tables at all comparable.

FRANK H. SCHOFIELD,
Rear Admiral, United States Navy.

REPLY

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 16, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The naval officer who prepared the memorandum transmitted to you by Admiral Schofield, in reply to my letter, does no credit either to your intelligence or to mine. He evades entirely the points that I made and devotes himself to incidental details.

In paragraph 2 he says that the table has no other significance than to "indicate the effect which the Washington treaty had on the decisions of the powers signatory to the Washington treaty." However, the table has been used for quite a different purpose, namely, to show the amount of building that has been carried on since the treaty, and that is quite a different thing.

Moreover, the statement made that "the signing of the Washington treaty created a new condition" can not be justified except as it applies to the two classes of ships, capital ships and airplane carriers, limited under the treaty.

In paragraph 3 he has missed the point entirely, which was that only by taking into consideration the ships under construction could a correct picture of the naval situation be given. It is unworthy of any intelligent person to assert that only ships laid down can show the building policy of a nation, when no account is taken of the state of the navies at the beginning of the period in question, including the ships under construction.

In paragraph 5, Admiral Schofield, like Admiral McNamee, begs the question and thereby proves the very point that I made. This speech of Admiral McNamee's was made, not before a group of naval officers or a congressional committee but before an audience of laymen, mostly women, who could not be expected in hearing a speech to draw the distinction between "laid down" and "constructed." In questioning several of the audience afterwards, I found exactly as I expected that the impression given was entirely contrary to Admiral McNamee's words. I repeat that the only purpose such a statement serves, when made to the uninformed public, is to obscure the truth. This can not be construed as an attack on Admiral McNamee.

In reply to the history of the building given in this paragraph, I wish to call to your attention the fact that both the American program for eight 10,000-ton 8-inch cruisers and the British program for five 10,000-ton 8-inch cruisers were authorized in the year 1924. The appropriation for the British cruisers was made in 1924 and for two of our cruisers early in 1925. If our first cruiser was laid down not until 1926 and the second not until 1927, that is for the Navy Department itself to explain, and it has nothing to do with the policy of the two Governments.

In paragraph 6, Admiral Schofield says that the discussions contained in my letter regarding capital ships are not germane. He evidently did not understand that I quoted Mr. FRENCH to show that he made exactly the same criticism on this sort of table that I have made. In other words, that ships under construction should be considered in discussing this subject, as well as ships laid down.

In paragraph 8, Admiral Schofield says that I place my opinion against professional opinion. Not at all. I place against professional opinion other opinion, presumably professional, on which President Coolidge made his statement two years ago, which I repeat: "Only one navy approaches ours and none surpasses it."

In paragraph 9, Admiral Schofield says that the point to be considered is whether vessels are fit for active service or are obsolete. The nine cruisers which the Navy Department includes among the British first-line cruisers are considered obsolete by the British, according to their naval experts.

In paragraph 11, Admiral Schofield discusses the replacement question. It seems to me that another very pertinent inquiry in determining this question of replacement is as to whether the proposed new ships would require an added number of enlisted men. As I understand it, the Navy Department has already announced that they would require an addition of 700 men each, or 10,500, if the cruisers were added to our fleet. If that is true, it would seem that that disposes very decisively of the replacement argument. I repeat that according to Secretary Wilbur, the 22 old cruisers were obsolete at the time of the Washington conference. I would like to ask Admiral Schofield if it is not true that the 10 cruisers of the Omaha class and the 8 "treaty" cruisers completed since that time were not designed to replace these old ships.

I did not attempt, as I said in my letter, to discuss the United States superiority in destroyers and submarines, because that is well recognized and was admitted by naval officers during the hearings before the House committee on the cruiser bill.

In paragraph 13 Admiral Schofield criticizes my suggestion that the 3 British ships which are on the disposal list should be omitted from the tables because he says I make no such proposal regarding the 22 obsolete cruisers. May I ask if these 22 cruisers are on the disposal list in the sense that the 3 British ships are?

In conclusion, I submit that the memorandum from Admiral Schofield is itself another example of the propaganda with which the spokesmen for the cruisers, by giving out only partial facts, are obscuring the issue and misleading the public.

Yours very sincerely,

LAURA PUFFER MORGAN,
Associate Secretary National Council for Prevention of War.

GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, at the last meeting of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission a report was approved providing for a memorial highway to Mount Vernon skirting the river. In addition to that the commission adopted the report of the executive committee to the effect that there should be a bill introduced authorizing the publication of the complete work of Washington; also recommending the printing of a map, known as the George Washington map, showing the places that he had visited during his lifetime; also the distribution of a portrait that has been selected and some other items of expense, calling for an authorization of $334,000. I introduce a bill for that purpose and ask that it may be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The bill (S. 5616) to enable the George Washington Bicentennial Commission to carry out and give effect to certain approved plans was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Library.

CIVIL WAR VETERANS' PENSIONS

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to amend the pension law for Civil War veterans, providing that any Civil War veteran who served 30 days or more instead of 90 days shall have a right to a pension at a rate lower than the regular pension now granted. I do this because I do not believe that it is fair that Civil War veterans should be required to have had 90 days of service before they are entitled to pensions when we allow veterans of the Indian war pensions after 30 days' service. Certainly if the Indian war survivors who served 30 days are entitled to pensions, then the Civil War veterans who served 30 days are likewise entitled to pensions, though perhaps not as high as those who served 90 days. I ask permission to have the bill printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 5617) granting pensions to certain veterans of the Civil War and their widows and children and to certain Army nurses of the Civil War, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That as used in this act the term "veteran" means a person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War for 30 days or more and less than 90 days and was honorably discharged from such service, and who was not discharged for, and did not die in such service of, a disability incurred in the service and in line of duty.

SEC. 2. Every veteran shall be paid a pension at the rate of $50 a month; except that every veteran who is or shall become totally helpless or blind shall be paid a pension of $70 a month, and every veteran who is or shall become so nearly helpless or blind as to require the regular personal attendance and aid of another person shall be paid a pension at the rate of $60 a month.

SEC. 3. (a) Every widow or former widow of a veteran honorably discharged from all contracts of service who was the wife of such veteran during the period of his service in such war shall be paid a pension at the rate of $40 a month.

(b) Every widow of a veteran who was married to the veteran prior to June 27, 1905, and is not entitled to pension under subdivision (a) of this section, shall be paid a pension at the rate of $22 a month; but any such widow who has attained or shall attain the age of 75 years shall be paid a pension at the rate of $30 a month. As used in this subdivision the term "widow" includes widows remarried once or more than once since the death of the veteran, if it be shown that each subsequent marriage has been dissolved by the death of the husband or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife.

(c) Any widow granted a pension by this section shall be paid additional pension at the rate of $6 a month for each child of the veteran under the age of 16 years, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow leaving a child or children of the veteran under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid to the child or children under the age of 16 years. In case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise mentally or physically helpless, the pension shall continue during the existence of such disability. No such widow whose name shall have been dropped from the pension roll because of her remarriage, if the pension has been granted to a child or children, shall be entitled to a renewal of pension under this section until the pension to the child or children shall terminate, unless such child or children be a member or members of her family and cared for by her, and upon the renewal of pension to such widow, payment of pension to such child or children shall cease.

SEC. 4. Every woman employed by the Surgeon General of the Army as a nurse, under contract or otherwise, during the Civil War, or who was employed as a nurse during such war by authority which is recognized by the War Department, and who rendered actual service as a nurse in attendance upon the sick or wounded in any regimental, post, camp, or general hospital of the Armies of the United States for a period of 90 days or more, and was honorably relieved from such service, and who is now or shall hereafter be unable to earn a support, upon making due proof of the fact under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall provide, shall be paid a pension at the rate of $40 a month.

SEC. 5. Pensions granted by this act shall commence from the date of filing application therefor in the Bureau of Pensions in such form as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 6. No claim agent, attorney, or other person shall contract for, demand, receive, or retain, for services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting claims for pensions granted by this act, any fee in excess of $10, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall directly or indirectly otherwise contract for, demand, receive, or retain a fee for services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under this act, or who shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner the whole or any part of the pension allowed for such pensioner under this act, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $500, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

AMENDMENT TO ADJUSTED COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I introduce a bill for reference to the Finance Committee, proposing an amendment to the World War adjusted compensation act as amended. I ask that a brief statement explaining this bill and some correspondence be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the ordinary RECORD type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Paragraph 1, section 502, of the World War adjusted compensation act provided "that the rate of interest shall be 2 per cent per annum more than the rate charged at the date of the loan for the discount of 90-day commercial paper under section 13 of the Federal reserve act by the Federal reserve bank for the Federal reserve district at which is located the regional office at which the loan is made."

It was the opinion of Congress when it enacted this provision that the interest charge should be in sympathy with prevailing money rates; thus under recent stringent money conditions some Federal reserve districts' discount rate was as high as 5 and 5½ per cent, and the rate, therefore, charged veterans for securing loans on their adjusted-service certificates was 7 and 7½ per cent. Section 1 of the amendment to the adjusted compensation act proposed by me provides that the rate should never be more than 6 per cent per annum.

Section 2 of the proposed amendment to the World War adjusted compensation act provides that when an adjusted compensation certificate, after delivery to the veteran, is torn or defaced and such torn or defaced certificate is surrendered to the director by the lawful holder thereof, no bond shall be required in order to receive a duplicate certificate.

This provision does not interfere with the present law which requires a bond to be filed when the certificate, after delivery to the veteran, is lost or destroyed in whole or in part. It merely provides that the veteran shall not have to furnish a bond in order to receive a new certificate when he can surrender to the Veterans' Bureau a torn or defaced certificate.

I am informed by the officers of the American Legion that there are several thousand cases of veterans who have torn and defaced certificates for which they are unable to obtain new certificates without furnishing bond, which, in many instances, they are unable to do.

The bill (S. 5631) to amend the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, was read twice by its title.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

The matter presented by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts and ordered to be printed in the RECORD is as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION, NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Inclosed find a copy of the bill which I spoke to you about relative to amending the adjusted compensation act on the question of interest rate charged veterans on loans and also relative to defaced or torn certificates.

I am inclosing also a copy of the resolution adopted by our San Antonio convention on this subject. This won't cost any money and I shouldn't think it would be very difficult to get through.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR,
National Legislative Committee.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION

* * * * * * *

Whereas, the rate of interest which the United States Veterans' Bureau shall charge upon a loan made to a World War veteran upon his adjusted compensation certificate is 2 per cent per annum more than the rate charged at the date of the loan for the discount of 90 days commercial paper under section 13 of the Federal reserve act, by the Federal reserve bank, for the Federal reserve district in which is located the regional office of hospital of the United States Veterans' Bureau at which the loan is made: Therefore be it

Resolved, by the Tenth Annual Convention of the American Legion, That the national legislative committee of the Legion be instructed to secure such changes in the law governing veterans' loans so that the maximum rate of interest shall at no time exceed 6 per cent.

* * * * * * *

Resolved, That the American Legion, in convention assembled, go on record as favoring amending section 705 of the World War adjusted compensation act to provide that when an adjusted service certificate is defaced or torn after delivery to the veteran, that a duplicate be issued without the requirement of a bond, upon the surrender of the defaced or torn certificate.

HOME EQUIPMENT SURVEY

Mr. WATERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD a report of the home equipment survey and the follow-up campaigns submitted by Mrs. John D. Sherman, president, to the General Federation of Women's Clubs at its biennial convention in 1928.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS
BIENNIAL CONVENTION,
San Antonio, Tex., May 28 to June 7, 1928.

DETAILED REPORT OF THE HOME EQUIPMENT SURVEY AND THE FOLLOW-UP CAMPAIGNS

By Mrs. John D. Sherman, President

I do not suppose there are many of you here who are not by this time familiar both with the original plans and with the results of the home-equipment survey. However, it is so important that we all of us have the whole thing clearly in our minds that I am going to give a brief review of the motive actuating the survey, the facts concerning its financing, the method used to secure the data, the findings of the survey, and the reception given to this body of information by the country at large.

1. Conception and motive of survey.

The challenge which had to be met at the outset by the American home department—created four years ago by you at my request—was the amazing fact that although home making is admitted unofficially to be the most important industry in the entire galaxy of the Nation's industries, it is the only one concerning which we have none of the information essential to progress and improvement. This fact is the more amazing and challenging because none of the other industries—it matters not how insignificant—is left without the aid of current data concerning the conditions of its progress. But we did not know four years ago to what extent the homes of the Nation were equipped with facilities indispensable to efficient home making. The Government publications tell us periodically just how many factories in each industry and in each geographical division are served by mechanical power—water, steam, or electric—but no Government or other publication could tell us how many homes were connected with water and sewer mains, gas mains; how many were centrally heated, or how many were lighted by electricity, gas, or by the labor-exacting kerosene lamp.

It was this condition that made the plan of a home-equipment survey appeal to me as a convincing method of approach to the problems of our modern home.

Every president of the general federation, with her executive committee, has to take the responsibility of selecting, from the many suggested plans for achieving its established ideals, those plans and methods which are most in accord with the organization's fundamental principles and which promise the best results. When the choice has been made, the executive head must select—and be responsible for her selection of—a competent technical staff to map out the best method of achieving the objectives of the plan, and, in the case of such a survey as this, to take charge of handling the material. For this purpose we engaged the services of the Industrial Survey and Research Service, of Washington, D. C., an agency having an established financial rating and the ability of whose directing officer, Miss Marie L. Obenauer, has been demonstrated in positions of public responsibility. Furthermore, I had known Miss Obenauer for many years and have absolute confidence in her.

Miss Obenauer had had a broad experience. She has served as chief of the woman's division of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, also as chief woman administrative examiner of the National War Labor Board. Was director of living conditions investigations for the United States Coal Commission, and is the author of articles and Government bulletins on women in industry, conditions of life among wage earners, and kindred subjects.

The need for more funds than the federation had to make the survey was as obvious as it was pressing. The first cooperation was sought from the magazines. The Woman's Home Companion accepted the proposition made by the general federation to pay $2,000 to cover the cost of printing and mailing the questionnaires, in return for which they were to have the prior right to publish final urban survey results. The Country Gentleman made the same agreement covering the farm-home survey. Later the Woman's Home Companion made an additional contribution of $3,000 to be used at headquarters for such purposes as the president saw fit independent of the survey.

The plans, roughly formulated, gradually took definite shape—the questionnaire, drafted in accordance with approved standards of survey practice, was printed, and finally, on May 8, 1925, the first urban home schedules were sent on their way to the presidents of every club in the general federation. At that time we expected to have the work finished within six months and did not hope for more data than would furnish the basis for two or three magazine articles designed to arouse the interest of the woman public, and would develop concrete arguments to convince Congress that the data should be collected periodically and comprehensively by the United States Census Bureau. Therefore, the survey was not organized State by State for the meager funds available would not permit such an organization. Furthermore, there was no evidence that the results would have warranted the expenditure had funds been available.

I can afford to tell you now with what trepidation and anxiety I awaited the first return of home equipment questionnaires. Would the club women go seriously to work on them and fill them out, or would these questionnaires, like so many others, find their way only to the scrap basket? The information sought, to be sure, was sought solely for the benefit of the American home makers, but would they recognize that fact and also the importance of it, over and above the annoyance and real work required to get these questionnaires correctly and completely filled out and sent back to Washington, D. C.

To the everlasting glory of club women, of club presidents, American home chairmen, State federation presidents, and directors, let it be said that thousands of them did understand, did see what it meant to the home, did buckle down to work and get the information sought, so that we were soon able to say "the survey is going to be a success." Just how much of a success, even we who were in Washington, could not quite foresee at first, but we were sure it would be worth while.

Within three weeks from the time the questionnaires were sent out there had come in returns covering 233 communities containing approximately half a million homes, representing 33 States. A careful and expert analysis of the data received furnished convincing proof not only that the material already collected was statistically valid but also that the survey, if reorganized on a State by State basis and enlarged to include the farm home, would furnish results that would be wholly dependable as a guide for an immediate concrete improvement campaign. Furthermore, it was plain that the result would furnish an impressive demonstration to Congress of the value of the data.

2. Method of securing data—both in the preliminary and expanded survey.

The method by which we were securing this valuable mass of information was as follows:

In every community where there was a federated club the club was asked to secure for its community the data on home equipment—the number of homes having water, sewer, or gas connections, the number wired for electricity or telephone, the number having central (i. e. boiler or furnace) heat, the number using coal or wood stoves for heating, the kind of stoves used for cooking, the various sorts of sanitary fixtures in the homes, kitchen sinks, bath tubs, flush toilets, etc., the various types of electrical labor-saving appliances in use, such as washing machines, irons, mangles, vacuum cleaners, refrigerators, dish washers, etc., the recreational facilities, automobiles, radios, pianos, phonographs. All these data were asked for from impersonal sources. In each case our club women gathered the information carefully and painstakingly for the community as a whole—not simply for club women in the community. In case there are some here who are not familiar with our method of obtaining the data, and who may wonder how it was possible to get such a mass of information, let me add a few illustrative details.

In all communities the cooperation of the town and public-utilities officials had been necessary, and was usually most willingly given. Through them the number of houses connected with water, sewer, gas, electricity, telephone, etc., was obtained, also the number of communities having garbage, ash, and trash collection. Through the gas and electric companies additional data on stoves and equipment of various sorts were secured, as well as from retail distributors. Often the electrical and telephone or gas companies put their whole clerical staff at work digging out the data we wanted. In a few cases, all avenues of information failing, the club women in small towns and sometimes the mayor or other officials made or instituted a house-to-house canvass to complete the schedules. The number of homes affected by data collected in this survey, however, constituted an insignificant proportion of the total.

For the farm survey a different schedule was, of course, found necessary. Since farms can not be grouped together in communities, each farm home maker was asked to fill in, or give the information for, a questionnaire for her own home. In this collection of data the extension workers from agricultural colleges gave a tremendous amount of very valuable assistance, as did also the State granges and many rural clubs.

Soon after the beginning of the survey it became apparent that the job of successfully handling all these data, so that the statistics resulting should overlook nothing of value, yet include nothing that was not statistically sound and based on reliable data, called not only for statistical supervision of the highest order (which we fortunately had), but an amount of detailed clerical work in tabulation and correspondence which would require fifteen times the funds which we had raised for the preliminary survey. Ways and means had to be considered.

FINANCING OF THE REORGANIZED AND ENLARGED SURVEY AND THE FOLLOW-UP CAMPAIGN

It was obvious at the beginning of the survey that, while the sole aim and desire of the general federation in making the survey was to benefit the American home maker, the collection of such a body of information as the survey would include and the follow-up campaign for better-equipped homes would be of great value to the industries concerned with home service and home equipment; that is, as I had sincerely hoped and believed, the results of the survey and the better equipped homes campaigns should stimulate women throughout the country to endeavor to bring their homes to a higher standard of equipment, the home-serving utilities and the manufacturers of all sorts of household equipment must inevitably reap a benefit.

Let me emphasize the fact that the by-product of benefit resulting from the survey and follow-up campaigns was inevitable—as inevitable as the profit that comes to masons, builders, and manufacturers when a congregation builds a church—though the profit is no more a part of the objective of one project than it is of the other. But the fact made the home-serving and home-equipping industries a right and logical source from which to request funds, even more so than were the women's magazines from which we had raised the four thousands used in the preliminary survey.

But we did not go hastily into the project of raising further funds outside of the federation to support the federation's enlarged home-equipment survey and the projected follow-up campaigns. Indeed, there were weeks in the summer of 1925 when the proposition was studied from every angle, when all the risks and disadvantages were ranged on one side and the objectives to be gained were ranged on the other, and the balance carefully drawn.

On the side of risks we set down the dangers of commercialism; the chance of honest misunderstanding and intentional misrepresentation; the temptation to use the contact to draw the federation into controversies which were matters of public policy and concerning which the federation must shape its course independent of any other consideration whatsoever.

On the side of advantages we set down the opportunity—rather, the necessity—of working with business men's organizations, thus making a contact through which to exert needed influence on the policies of such organizations in the interest of home and community; the help of first-hand information and experience, without which the campaign for better equipped homes must evaporate in talk and mere publicity and our survey end in purely academic research and statistical analysis. Finally, on the side of advantages was the inescapable fact that funds raised for the support of the work from home-serving and home-equipping industries need not—in fact, could not—create any obligation to these organizations of business men because the inevitable by-product of benefit for the survey and follow-up campaigns, which I have just pointed out must more than compensate for any funds which we would ask for or the industries would contribute to our campaign.

Among those of vision and experience who were consulted as to the logic, advisability, advantage, and disadvantage of raising additional funds from industrial associations was a Cabinet officer of outstanding prestige in the Coolidge administration. Instantly he recognized the fact that no obligation, implied or expressed, need be created by such contributions. In substance, this Cabinet officer, after considering briefly the results of the preliminary survey, said: "There is no doubt of a need of better equipment in the American homes; of a larger use of mechanical power as a substitute for human power. It is equally obvious that more equipment and more power will mean millions to the home-serving and home-equipping industries, whether you like it or not.

"That condition is the warrant for using the industry's money in contributions of this sort. Your obligation for contributions is paid for many times in doing the work you have set out to do, namely, to raise the level of equipment in American homes for the benefit of American homes. If your organization takes stands on policies which these industrial associations do not like, that is nothing to you and they have no grounds for complaint. If I were in your place," said the Cabinet officer, "I would take all the money I could get from such sources for the benefit of the American home, just so long as you make sure that they understand that the contributions are made without strings of any sort."

When the balance of advantage and disadvantage was struck, there was no question as to our course. We sought and got the cooperation and financial support of associations concerned in serving and equipping the home. So large was the advantage that it was not difficult to muster the courage necessary to face the risks.

On the other hand, we did not neglect to guard against the known dangers—a caution which distinguishes courage from recklessness. At the outset we put in writing first to the National Electric Light Association, from whom initial funds for the enlarged survey were asked, the fact that any contributions made were made solely on the basis of home-equipment activities and had no bearing, expressed or implied, on any other matter. In my letter of September 1, 1925, to the managing director of the National Electric Light Association there is this paragraph:

"* * * It is necessary for us to guard against any misapprehension within or without our organization concerning the conditions under which these funds would be raised for the general federation's home-equipment survey by your organization. The general federation could not if it would and would not if it could commit itself or any of its units to or against any policy of regulation, operation, or ownership of public utilities. I learned from you during our personal conferences that your organization would not want such a pledge, implied or expressed, attached to the raising of these funds, even if we were able or inclined to make it; that aside from the civic interest which would prompt assistance in a movement for the betterment of American homes there are logic and adequate warrant for contributions from public utilities companies of all sorts—telephone, gas, water, power, light—because homes better equipped to lighten the labor and increase the efficiency of the American home maker must result inevitably in a larger measure of service from public utilities. This is as obvious as that increased circulation resulting from discussion of a valuable book is a benefit to the publisher. Such benefits we do not begrudge, but I must guard our contemplated work against the handicap of honest misunderstanding and intentional misrepresentation by having this phase of the subject covered in your reply. * * *"

I received on September 15, 1925, from the managing director a telegram which, because covering matters not concerned with funds, did not in my mind cover adequately the foregoing questions quoted from my letter. I sent a telegram to the managing director September 23, 1925, in which I said:

"Will you please wire me immediately stating whether your September 15 telegram was in effect an agreement to the propositions in my letter of September 1."

The next day, September 26, 1925, the managing director wired:

"My September 15 telegram was in effect an agreement to the proposition in your letter of September 1 subject to an extension of time and my ability to raise the funds from our companies."

Like all other records pertaining to the survey the complete file of correspondence, including the letters and telegrams from which the above paragraphs are quoted, is a part of the permanent records of the president's office, at the headquarters of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, 1734 N Street NW., Washington, D. C. That exactly the same conditions were laid down to the sanitary facility and heating device industries from whom contributions were finally asked is shown by the following excerpts from telegrams and letters, all of which are on file at headquarters.

From telegram sent to Trade Extension Bureau (representing manufacturers of sanitary facilities and heating devices), January 13, 1927:

"Answering your January 10 special delivery: Entire budget is raised and expended as one fund and primarily for better equipped homes. Campaign not in interest of any industry. Contribution amounting to approximately one-third year's budget was asked from your industries because they would benefit from the work though that benefit is not an objective. This was basis upon which contribution was asked of your association. I believe that request was granted last October with clear understanding and full approval of your members. But if I am mistaken, pledge should be reconsidered at your meeting now because money could not be accepted on any other conditions than that it be part of one fund expended for year's work for better equipped homes. * * *"

Having counted carefully the cost, having raised the reasonable guards against dangers of misapprehension and willful misrepresentation, and having with the approval of the executive committee decided to ask funds of the industries concerned in home service and home equipment, we moved forward. As reported to you in my address before the Atlantic City convention, we made our first request of $30,000 from the National Electric Light Association and received $30,000.

TOTAL FUNDS RAISED FOR HOME EQUIPMENT ACTIVITIES SINCE THE BEGINNING OF THE WORK—MARCH, 1925

The salient facts concerning the funds raised for this activity—including the $4,000 from the magazines and the $30,000 from the National Electric Light Association previously reported, are these:

First. One hundred and seven thousand dollars is the total fund raised for the work since its inception March 18, 1925—an average of about $35,000 a year.

Second. Slightly more than four-fifths of this fund, or $87,000, was spent in (1) collecting and publishing data concerning nearly 8,000,000 homes in 2,228 communities of 48 States; in corresponding work on data covering equipment of 40,000 farm homes; and (2) reassembling nation-wide figures, State by State and locality by locality—working out plans and suggestions for follow-up campaigns, gathering supplemental material as requested; assisting in organizing State campaigns when requested and in bringing Federation's Home Equipment Primer to printing stage.

Third. Slightly less than a fifth of the $107,000, or $20,000, was used at headquarters to meet the increased expense created by the survey and follow-up activities. Out of this fund came a large share of the money used in building up the publicity department—a service absolutely essential not only to facilitate properly and control effectively the dissemination of information concerning the purpose and progress of the survey and follow-up campaigns, but to maintain that departmental balance in publicity without which the whole organization's work would suffer.

Fourth. The entire $197,000 fund was requested by the general federation and was pledged by the association after plans for the survey and the follow-up campaigns had been made and approved by the executive committee. No changes were asked, suggested, or made in the general federation's survey or follow-up campaigns policies by the contributing parties, viz, the Woman's Home Companion, the Country Gentleman, the American Gas Association, the National Electric Light Association, and the manufacturers of household sanitary and heating facilities functioning through the National Trade Extension Bureau. The fund has been under the exclusive and unhampered control of the general federation in accordance with the stipulation made at the outset.

The entire fund is accounted for by the industrial survey and research service in its regular quarterly reports covering the progress and finances of the survey; and in the treasurer's reports covering the expenditure of $20,000 of the $107,000 used at headquarters to meet the overhead and collateral expense created by the survey activities. Summaries of these reports, together with a statement of finances involved in the issuance and sale of the Home Equipment Primer, you will find here, to-day, in the printed report of the treasurer.

There is incorporated in the report also the auditor's report covering the examination of all of these funds except the $4,000 paid for the preliminary survey by the two publishing companies. The auditor's report does not cover these two payments of $2,000 each because, with the consent of the executive committee, they were made directly to the industrial survey and research service upon the president's approval of the work done by that agency. This arrangement was made when the survey was regarded as a matter taking from three to six months and when it was necessary to expedite procedure. The funds contributed did not cover more than the bare physical expense of the survey, such as printing, postage, stenography, etc., the expert service being given without charge by the industrial survey and research service. The amount involved did not warrant setting up a separate fund, nor was it feasible in so short a time to incorporate the expenditure in the general federation's regular booking system; therefore, direct payments of the $4,000 were authorized under conditions named above. All the other funds, however, viz, $103,000, raised for the reorganized and enlarged home-equipment activities, were paid directly to general federation and are covered in the auditor's report.

MAY 3, 1928.

Mrs. JOHN D. SHERMAN,
President General Federation of Women's Clubs,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MADAM: Pursuant to your request, we have examined the recorded cash receipts and cash disbursements of the special funds.—General Federation of Women's Clubs, Washington, D. C., administered by Mary K. Sherman, president, for the period from October 5, 1925, to April 30, 1928, and submit herewith our report.

We have prepared and include as a part of this report detailed exhibit covering all recorded cash transactions for the period under review.

We verified the cash balance at April 30, 1928, by direct communication with the National Metropolitan Bank, Washington, D. C., and reconciled the balance reported to us on officially signed certificates with the book balance.

The recorded cash receipts for the period from October 5, 1925, to April 30, 1928, were traced into the bank statements. All recorded cash disbursements for the same period were verified by examination of canceled bank checks, paid invoices, and other approved data on file.

During the period under review, there were contributions received through the general fund, General Federation of Women's Clubs, in the amount of $23,000; of this amount $8,000 was received during the period from October 5, 1925, to June 12, 1926, and the balance, $15,000, was received between June 13, 1926, and March 30, 1928. This information is to support the disbursements shown on the cash records of the general fund, General Federation of Women's Clubs.

We have been advised by the industrial survey and research service that they have received direct from the Woman's Home Companion of the Crowell Publishing Co. and from the Country Gentleman of the Curtis Publishing Co., contributions of $2,000 each. These contributions were not recorded on the books examined by us.

Very truly yours,

[SEAL.] ERNST & ERNST,
Certified Public Accountants.

Special funds, administered by Mary K. Sherman, president, recorded cash receipts and disbursements, General Federation of Women's Clubs, Washington, D. C.

To relieve the general federation of the necessity of continuing exclusive agreements with one or another magazine for the publication of home equipment and other general federation articles, and yet to insure the needed magazine publicity all articles in the home-equipment campaign since November, 1926, have been placed through the Lord & Thomas and Logan syndicate. These articles dealt with all phases of home and community equipment; water, sewer connections, gas, telephone, electricity, garbage collection, all of the public services which have an intimate domestic bearing, radio and Government recognition of the American home maker.

WHAT THE COMPLETED SURVEY SHOWED

Having taken so much time in describing the source of our operating funds and the organization and method of the survey, I can only touch briefly upon the survey results. As there have been a dozen or more signed magazine articles and thousands of columns of news stories about the results of the urban and farm survey, I need not, in fact, take much time in discussing the assembled data here. The final urban results, covering 8,000,000 town and city homes, were published in the fall of 1926; and in the spring of 1927 the results of the farm-home survey were made public.

It was obvious, in both the urban and farm surveys, that progress made in that greatest of all American industries, the home, lagged far behind the progress made in every other field. Many conspicuous defects were revealed in our American home equipment, and in what we have always been proud to call our American home standards. There was town after town, thousands of them, some of them running up to 25,000 population with no public water system or no public sewer system; there were cities of no mean size that had no public garbage or trash collection and, of course, hundreds of small towns were shown to be without this service.

The commonest home equipment found was the kitchen sink, the flush toilet, and electric lights, yet nearly a fifth of all our urban homes were without stationary sinks and nearly a third were without bath tubs. Central heat was conspicuous by its absence in States where the climate would seem to make it imperative.

The farm homes, for the most part beyond the reach of public utilities, are more dependent on their own ability to provide home conveniences. Naturally the percentage of homes with running water, bath rooms, and electric lights was a great deal smaller. Also the percentage of homes having heat supplied by a boiler or furnace was less, though the reason for the difference is not so compelling.

In both the urban and farm homes the use made of modern facilities and power labor-saving appliances was shown to be too small when measured by our proclaimed doctrines of conservation and efficiency. The fact that no other country makes anything like as much use of such facilities or of mechanical power in the homes as the United States seems to me beside the point. We are not seeking to measure ourselves by other nations, but by the highest standards we ourselves know and can attain. I have been proud of the attitude shown by the club women toward the facts shown by the survey. They have shown neither resentment nor anger at defects revealed; they have shown pride when the facts justified such pride; and they have, on the whole, evinced a desire to get to work and make right the things that seemed to be wrong—which is the most inspiring result of the whole survey.

RECEPTION GIVEN TO THE SURVEY DATA

We in Washington have had such endless testimony of the value which has been placed on the survey by people outside of the federation that we have prepared an easily handled pamphlet which will give you a bird's-eye view of this volume of heartening comment. The pamphlet is called Mirrowed in the Mail. Be sure to get a copy. It is interesting reading.

HOW THE SURVEY RESULTS WERE PUT TO WORK

Even before the farm-home survey for the country as a whole was entirely finished, some of the States which had finished both their urban and farm surveys promptly had received the complete report of the urban results in their respective States, and after studying the analyses were already demanding, "Well, what is the next step in the program?"

It had long been obvious that the next step was going to be the one which would really count in raising the standards of our home equipment. For, however interesting and important a lot of statistics may be, however necessary they are as a preliminary to any plan of action, unless they are actually used as the basis for constructive work, they are about as profitless and expensive a luxury as a deep-dug cellar hole and well-laid foundation walls with no house on top of them. It is always surprising to see how much the well-laid foundations of a house cost, but no one ever thinks of building a lasting edifice without them. The general federation had now, with much painstaking labor, laid the foundations. What was the superstructure to be?

My hope from the start had been that, as fast as each State saw just what the facts were about the equipment of its own homes, the women and men together would work out plans by which the home maker should reap the benefit of the work which had been done in the survey. For these statistics had been compiled not for the benefit of economists or sociologists or statisticians or industries but for the American home makers.

In some way, or in many ways, this valuable body of material had to be used to raise the level of operating efficiency in our homes.

JOINT ACTION BY MEN AND WOMEN

It was evident that if the constructive work was really to accomplish its aim in the States and throughout the country the General Federation of Women's Clubs and its constituent State and local organizations must have not only expert technical advice, but everywhere they must enlist the cooperation of the Federal, State, and city officials, of educators, of the representatives of home serving and home equipping industries; they must have contact with other women, particularly the farm women, who were often outside of the federation, and with the farm bureaus. All these contacts were necessary not only to get the federation idea across to the public but to translate the idea into action, because, as I have said scores of times in public addresses, lifting the level of home equipment is a straight 50-50 man-woman job.

And so to every State federation which asked advice from headquarters there went, with the detailed suggestion for a follow-up campaign, our slogan, "Cooperate." Get your men to work with you. Get the interest of the press and assure yourselves of its cooperation. Talk over the plans with the extension service of your State agricultural college and get the State home demonstration leaders to join in them. See that the expert advice of the college may be available for farm home problems. Get your town officers to understand what you want to do and why; then get them to help you do it. And get advisers representing the State's home serving and home equipping industries, which are inevitably concerned in improved home equipment. But, and this was a word of admonition which I emphasized then and wish to emphasize again now: "Do not get out of the driver's seat for anybody. Keep tight hold of the wheel and do the starting, stopping, and steering yourself or you may find that some one else will be so pleased with the car which you made for the American home maker that he may seize the wheel and wreck the car—not wittingly, perhaps, but irreparably nevertheless.

The motives of the general federation in this work were, are, and, I hope, always will be single purposed in their desire to benefit American home makers. Others whose road lies the same way as ours can ride with us till our roads branch. Then they must get out. We can not stop to wait for them. We have not turned aside for them. Our road led straight to our goal and we have followed it faithfully to the end of this administration. This is the principle which has governed the general federation's home equipment activities.

But it is essential that I repeat here what I said at Grand Rapids about the responsibility of State officers in connection with the activity. In effect it is this:

"If a State adopts the plan of the general federation in getting better equipment into its homes, it will conduct a campaign that will not in the least obscure the civic and educational character of the organization. Indeed, if the principle of the plan is followed throughout the educative quality of the organization will be enhanced and emphasized in the public mind.

"On the other hand, the activity can easily be diverted into commercialism if the State and local federation officials in charge want to make it commercial or are not on their guard to prevent it from becoming commercial. I find it constantly necessary to keep pointing out the distinction between cooperation and commercialism, so I take this opportunity to emphasize again the importance of maintaining this line of demarcation. The main objective of our campaign is better-equipped homes. No activity is allowed to get started or to be conducted until that activity has been determined by the federation's officials to be in the interest of the homes of that State and its communities.

"In the plan of the general federation's follow-up campaigns better-equipped homes are not only the main objective—they are the exclusive objective. It might be to the interest of the utilities in a State or community to urge the use of piped gas as a house-heating agent. But unless it is first determined that gas as a house-heating fuel is an economic proposition for the homes of that particular community, the federation is under obligation to prevent any activity looking to the popularization of gas as a general heating unit. If, by competent and disinterested authority, it is determined to be an economic method of home heating, even then the plan of the federation does not countenance the advertising or promotion of any particular gas-using devices. The function of the federation is to disseminate dependable information concerning the wise use of fuels in home heating in the communities affected.

"The industries concerned in town water works and sewer systems might be greatly benefited by campaign for such installations in given communities. Conditions might be such that the best interest of the homes in that community are served for the present by other sanitary methods of sewage disposal and other safe systems of water distribution. When that is the case it is the business of the local federation officials having charge of equipment campaign, if they are following the general federation's plan, to give wide publicity to that fact regardless of the interest of the sewer and water pipe industries. Also, whatever the decision, no individual firm's devices for water distribution and sewage disposal are advertised by the federation if that State federation is working by the general federation's plan of follow-up campaigns.

"We do not advertise any firm's pumping device or septic tank; we do not extol any firm's washing machine, sweeper, or dish washer; but we do advocate the washing of clothes and the sweeping of floors by the use of mechanical power rather than by human energy; we do advocate running water in every home; we do decry lugging water into any house; we preach the outlawing of the outhouse; we do urge cooking by gas or electricity and the adoption of house-heating methods that will yield the most heat and most healthful heat for every dollar expended at a minimum of physical labor. This is the policy maintained by the general federation toward all agencies and devices in home equipment.

"There has been the most cordial assent to this policy by outstanding executives of the industrial and utility associations whose cooperation we requested in this campaign. Scores of industrial leaders have accorded us the fullest cooperation in our efforts to keep the activity from being commercialized as well as in our efforts to promote an educational campaign for better equipment in American homes.

"A heavy obligation rests upon all State officials undertaking a campaign to keep clear in the public mind that our better-equipped homes campaign has as its single objective the raising of the level of equipment in the American homes in order that we may eliminate wasteful drudgery and conserve American mother energy for the enrichment of American family life.

"To do this effectively, we must have the cooperation of men and women, for both are concerned in better-equipped homes and better community facilities. But to keep the ideal high in the consciousness of the public we must keep the activity free from other objectives, and, above all, must we keep it free from that commercialism which prompts activities in the interest of industries regardless of the needs of the homes.

"Furthermore, the whole campaign is hurt if one State or local campaign is diverted to commercialism. This is a compelling reason for keeping in mind the authorized home-equipment campaign plan which is based on essential cooperation between the general federation and the leaders of home-serving industries and professional associations. Finally, let us laugh to scorn and out of court the stupid contention that we must refrain from urging better equipment in our homes because a higher level of equipment in American homes must necessarily increase the volume of business done by home-serving utilities and home-equipping industries. As well decry the cultivation of a taste for music because the makers of musical instruments will profit thereby. As well suppress commendation of good books because the publishers must profit by the commendation. As well cry down the effort to reduce accidents by the installation of safety devices because the makers of such devices will profit by the campaign."

THE STATE CAMPAIGNS

In two-thirds of our 48 States the data collected through our nation-wide survey have been put to work for better-equipped homes. During the home-equipment hour of the convention you will hear from their own lips what some of the State presidents, American home-department chairmen, and other officers in charge of the work have done to raise the level of house-making efficiency in their own States. But I can not refrain from dipping into some of the inspiring stories here.

I do not think it was by chance that the first State to finish both its urban and farm surveys was a State in which the leadership had been in the hands of one of our most able members—a woman whose deep interest, clear vision, and rare executive ability made her peculiarly fitted to take a pioneer rôle in the task of "doing something." Mrs. Will Minier, the president of the Nebraska State Federation of Women's Clubs, was the leader of the first group of State trail makers which started forth in the "follow-up campaign."

Mrs. Minier studied carefully the survey results showing the equipment of Nebraska homes and communities. Then, in consultation with the general federation home-equipment office, she worked out her plan of procedure, which included preliminary conferences with educators, State and city officials, and appropriate industrial and business representatives. As a result of these conference Mrs. Minier got under way a state-wide program to bring home equipment to a state of efficiency comparable with operating equipment of other industries. She succeeded in enlisting the support of practically every newspaper in Nebraska, not only to carry articles about the results of the survey, but to run continuous stories of interest about the follow-up campaign.

In addition, weekly syndicated articles on Better-Equipped Homes by Mrs. Minier, special articles by Miss Mary Ellen Brown, of the State Agricultural College, and articles by various well-known club women on different phases of the subject appeared in papers all over the State for three months. Movie houses ran slogans, a better-homes poster contest was opened to the boys and girls of the State. At each of the district meetings there was an exhibit of sanitary equipment and labor-saving devices. The unfederated clubs of the State put on nine achievement-day programs, demonstrating simple water systems for small towns or rural homes which did not have access to public-water supplies.

As a grand finale of the year's work a newly built house was completely equipped for exhibit at the State convention at Kearney. In this final exhibit all departments helped to make the home complete in every way.

In Mrs. Minier's own words, "The Nebraska federation has had the splendid cooperation of the agricultural college of the State university, business firms, manufacturing houses, public-utilities companies, newspapers, magazines, and motion-picture houses."

What the campaign meant to the home makers is shown by the following extract from a letter written to Mrs. Minier by an officer of the University Publishing Co. of Lincoln, Nebr.:

"Many hundreds of homes are being definitely benefited as a result of the constructive and forceful campaign in the interest of better-equipped homes. The syndicated articles on better homes are the first ever published in Nebraska which have made anything like a lasting impression. I certainly congratulate the president of the Nebraska State federation on the splendid results achieved."

Texas, which got its campaign under way just after Nebraska, has put on a very efficient campaign under the splendid leadership of Mrs. J. L. Young, making the State and county fairs special demonstration points. In Rhode Island, Mrs. Ellis P. Thurber aroused new interest in the long-standing defects of the cities and towns of the State in the important matter of sewage disposal and already prompt results are being seen in the activity of many towns toward improved methods, and Providence is extending its sewer to outlying districts.

Ohio, under Dr. Josephine L. Peirce, put under way an inspiring campaign, an outstanding feature of which was an essay contest in all the schools on Adequate Home Equipment. The winners, however, were the mothers as well as the contestants, and, as the grand prize included a trip to Washington, there were eight home makers, as well as eight high-school girls and boys, who came to Washington for a week. We shared in the good time, too, because we had the young people and the mothers and the other visitors—who included one father—to tea at headquarters.

In Florida, the department of health chairman, Mrs. Ethel E. Porter, and Mrs. Dwight R. Read, worked together on the problem of water and sewer systems, after finding out just what cities lacked them, and Mrs. Read led fine work for better-equipped homes throughout the State.

Minnesota informally started her campaign in the spring of 1926, under the direction of Mrs. Willard Bayliss, and later formally launched a state-wide campaign, a feature of which has been the remodeling and equipping of several old homes and demonstration centers.

In Illinois Mrs. J. Marc Fowler, as head of the better-equipped homes campaign, held regional conferences to discuss the results of the survey and conducted educational campaigns. As a result, evening meetings, open to men and women, with qualified speakers, presented the problems of installing water and sewer systems in small towns. A distinctive feature in Illinois was the radio mass meeting, over which the then State president, Mrs. Seymour, presided and to which she introduced the various speakers.

Arkansas and Mississippi made a splendid effort, and a successful one, to get the needs of their States before the public and to see that in restoring the homes ravaged by the flood, as far as possible, the standards of construction included the essentials of modern home equipment. Miss Susie V. Powell, of Mississippi, made excellent use of the State fair to stage an exhibit and demonstration, and Mrs. W. F. Lake, of Arkansas, wrote: "All Arkansas is at work to put running water and tubs, toilets, and sinks in every home and install, wherever possible, gas and electricity."

Miss Grace P. Gillette, American home-department chairman in Washington, and Mrs. Jennie McComb in Oregon conducted exhibits and institutes both in the large cities and throughout the State.

Reports sent to the General Federation home-equipment office show that Montana, Iowa, Michigan, Missouri, Colorado, North Carolina, and West Virginia have all undertaken state-wide activities for better equipped homes, while Wisconsin, Maine, Idaho, New Hampshire, and Kansas have given splendid publicity through both press and public addresses to the results of the survey.

In almost all of the other States the American home-department chairmen have at least presented the results of the survey for discussion at the meetings last fall or sent out results to each of the local club presidents with suggestions for local action.

THE HOME-EQUIPMENT PRIMER

Another direct result of the survey and an integral part of the better-equipped homes campaign has been the preparation, printing, and copyrighting of the general federation's Home Equipment Primer, issued in five parts.

In studying the whole subject of home equipment we found, from the beginning, a conspicuous lack of trustworthy and unbiased information on the various types of appliances available for home use.

Furthermore, if there were a dozen different things a homemaker wanted to know about, it might mean a dozen different lines of search. Nowhere were all the things which pertained to the complete equipment of a modern home with the best sanitary facilities and labor-saving machinery of proven and established quality and performance, gathered together between two covers in such form that the layman—not the engineer or the technical expert or scientist, but the average American homemaker—could easily understand just what each type of appliance offered to the home and the approximate cost of such appliance. It seemed to us, who had been working so eagerly to get the greatest returns possible from the survey, that some such compilation would be of immense value to the homemakers. Here they could study, any time they had a few minutes, without even going out of the house, the many different types of equipment that belonged in an up-to-date home; could get a good idea of their cost, could see what things were within the limits of possibility for themselves. I know that I myself, before we began this survey, did not even know of the existence of many things now familiar to me through our study, and I am sure there must have been many more like me.

So in the Washington office we undertook the compilation of what we decided to call the Home Equipment Primer, a copy of each part of which was sent as it came from the press to each State president, State American home chairman, and to each local chairman actively engaged in the better-equipped homes campaign. Many of you are familiar with its five separate editions—one for homes in towns equipped with every sort of public utility—water, sewer, gas, and electricity; another for homes where no public utilities are available, and the others for homes where different combinations of the home-serving utilities are within reach.

But however familiar you may be with the primer, I doubt if any of you realize the vast amount of work which it involved, the study of every single thing listed in it, the infinite pains taken to establish the certainty that all mechanisms included were sound, tried devices; that everything said in the primer was scientifically and technically true; that everything was fairly represented; that prices and costs represented accurately the range of prices under given conditions. There is not a page of the primer that has not been gone over with engineers and experts from the United States Government and with expert representatives of the industries concerned in the products. Do I need to tell you that it was a costly piece of work to bring the primer to the printing stage?

I hope, therefore, that you are going to make great use of the primer, and that it will fill a real need in every home. We have tried to keep its price within reach of every one. The little pamphlet to which I have referred, and entitled "Mirrored in the Mails," will give you a vivid glimpse of the club leaders, and the public's reaction to the primer, as well as to the better-equipment homes campaign.

CENSUS RECOGNITION OF HOME MAKERS AND STATISTICS ON HOME EQUIPMENT

As I mentioned at the outset in this address, one of the reasons for making the home-equipment survey was the fact that the United States Census neither recognized home making as an occupation, nor gave any attention to listing the equipment of the home, despite universal acknowledgment that the home was really the most important industry of the country. Beginning in 1925, the general federation started a campaign for recognition of the home makers. We were not content that they should be classed by default with those having no occupation—lunatics, criminals, and paupers, the sick, and the incurables—and with all the really idle, adult women whom the Nation was carrying as a dead weight. We felt not only that the recognition of "home making" as an occupation was obligatory under any standards of fair play or justice, but that removing the calling from its present companions in the "no-occupation" group would give home making new importance and dignity.

Furthermore, the survey had revealed the great extent to which our homes needed to be brought more nearly abreast of the progress which marked every other activity in American life. It had shown that the lack of the sense of values was nowhere more manifest than in the home-making equipment of this Nation's twenty-odd million homes.

What I have said about the failure of the Government thus far to recognize home making as an occupation constitutes no criticism of the United States Census Bureau, the Department of Commerce, nor of the Congress of the United States. The Census Bureau, like every other bureau in every department of the Government, does what Congress tells it to do and gives it the money to do. And Congress gives instructions and money to carry out what it believes to be the will of the people. We women home makers—numbering surely a score of millions or more—have only now let our fluid wishings for recognition harden into a definite, deliberated, determined will to be counted among the productive forces of the Nation. It will be some two years before our good Uncle Samuel will make his usual 10-year inspection of the humans and human activities on his premises, though, of course, he must start preparations long before the actual inspection begins. We are, therefore, expressing this will in good time to have it considered by the Census Bureau, the Department of Commerce, and the Congress of the United States.

The first step has been taken in that the law providing for the 1930 census has been so altered as to give the Secretary of Commerce the power he did not clearly have before—namely, to grant recognition to home makers and to collect germane home-equipment facts.

THE FUTURE OF THE MOVEMENT STARTED BY THE HOME-EQUIPMENT SURVEY AND THE FOLLOW-UP CAMPAIGN UNDER THE AMERICAN HOME DEPARTMENT

So far it has been my privilege to lead you in this effort in behalf of women's most important undertaking. Whatever developments may come in the future will be for the new administration to plan and carry out. But I do strongly recommend again what I have urged before—that the general federation go forward in organized efforts for better equipment in American homes with clear-headed discrimination and stout-hearted determination to cut down the waste of mother energy, in the interest of a better family and community life in this beloved land of ours.

Unanimously approved by the convention.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in a recent issue of the New York Times appears a brilliant article on the farm-aid case by the able junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER]. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The article is as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, January 20, 1929]

SENATOR CAPPER STATES THE FARM-AID CASE—TARIFF MEASURES, LOWER TRANSPORTATION COST, AND GOVERNMENT HELP IN COOPERATIVE MARKETING ARE IMPORTANT FACTORS IN RELIEF PROGRAM

By ARTHUR CAPPER, Senator from Kansas, member of Committee on Agriculture

After eight years, during which the agricultural depression has passed through the acute stages of 1921–1923 and almost reached the point where it has become chronic, we now face for the first time a real hope of almost certain legislative action.

Apparently it has taken that time for big business, national political leaders, and statecraft to realize and admit that there is a farm problem; that this farm problem also is a national problem, and that agriculture is entitled to governmental aid in solving it.

Until now those who have stated there is a real farm problem have been called upon to prove it. This is no longer necessary. The Industrial Conference Board, the United States Chamber of Commerce, both major political parties, and the President elect of the United States all have admitted the problem, have admitted the Government's responsibility in assisting to work out the solution, and have promised that its solution will be attempted in earnest.

Mr. Hoover will call a special session of Congress for that purpose. This seems to be generally accepted. I believe legislation can be of assistance to agriculture. I would say that immediate governmental aid for agriculture should include:

1. Higher tariffs on farm products on an import basis—livestock, dairy products, meats, corn, oil seeds, etc.
2. Lower transportation costs.
3. Government aid for cooperative marketing; guidance and assistance in orderly marketing through the farmers' cooperative marketing associations (including financial assistance in initiating).
4. Curbing of grain gambling.
5. The equivalent in effect of a protective tariff for surplus farm products (those on an export basis), coupled with a brake on overproduction.

At the close of the fiscal year ended June 30, when agriculture was "doing better" than at any time in the past eight years, the American farmer as a whole was doing business at a loss of only 10 per cent as compared to the 5-year period of 1910–1914. That is, at the close of the fiscal year 1928—on the basis of a list of several hundred commodities that the farmer actually buys—the American farmer was paying $1.57 for what he bought for $1 in 1910–1914. The American farmer as a whole during the fiscal year 1928 received $1.41 for the products for which he received $1 in the period 1910–1914.

FIGURES ARE THE GOVERNMENT'S

These figures are official. They are not mine. They are not political statements. They do not come from farm-organization leaders urging legislation. They come from the statistical experts in a Government department. And also they agree, in substance, with the conclusions of the Industrial Conference Board and with the conclusions of every actual student who has made a real study of the factors involved.

What buying at $1.57 and selling at $1.41 means is that the purchasing power of agriculture's products is 90 per cent of what it was in the 5-year period 1910–1914. Again, up to and including 1920, the annual income of agriculture had never been less than 20 per cent of the national annual income.

Since 1920 agriculture's annual income never has been as much as 11 per cent of the national income. It has been as low as one-twelfth of the annual income, compared to one-fifth preceding 1920–21. By "preceding 1920–21" I do not refer merely to the war days but to a period reaching back at least two decades before we entered the World War.

Now, the country as a whole has a decidedly keen interest in what the facts just stated mean. The fact that agriculture's income is only one-tenth instead of one-fifth of the annual income may strike the individual business man as a matter of only academic interest. "Too bad for the farmer; but, really, he ought to look out for himself better."

ONE-FOURTH OF PEOPLE FARMING

But when you measure that in terms of purchasing power and reflect that more than one-fourth of the people of the United States are in the business of farming, and that nearly one-half of our people depend almost directly upon agriculture for their living, it comes closer to home.

We have learned the lesson that higher wages and more leisure increase the purchasing power and the purchasing habits of the workingmen. When farming pays the buying power of at least one-third of our population increases. And contrary to what a lot of folks believe the farmer when he has money is a liberal spender.

It is true that the farm problem is an economic problem and must be solved along economic not along partisan political lines. But it also is true that after the war the transportation industry of this country faced an economic problem. And we passed the Esch-Cummins Transportation Act.

Also it is true that American labor faced an economic problem in the unrestrained flow of cheap labor into this country from abroad. And we passed the immigration act. Banking and finance faced also an economic, not a political, problem. And we have passed innumerable protective tariff acts since.

In a general way the foregoing states the farm problem. It shows that after eight years of waiting, of tumult and shouting, of legislative jams and vetoes, of movements and conventions and resolutions and able analyses by economists and others it is economically unsound, to use a phrase popular in certain quarters—agriculture to-day faces this fact:

Agricultural income is still out of line with industrial income, out of line with labor's wages, out of line with financial and commercial returns. To state the fact in bald and simple terms, farming does not pay.

As has been pointed out, there are a number of contributing factors. Power, labor, transportation, financial operations are among the factors that enter into the prices for what the farmer buys. In large measure these enjoy a protected home market, thanks to tariff laws, the transportation act, "fair-return-on-investment" rulings and regulations, the immigration act, the Federal reserve act, and other factors that might be mentioned. Most of these factors also enter into the farmer's own costs of production; they are a charge against him when he buys and up to the time when he is ready to sell.

Then he sells such of his products as are on an export basis—that is, the surplus in the domestic market—in the world market in competition with farm products in countries where labor is cheap and where prices are lower than on the home market.

It is not only that the small surplus sold abroad goes at the lower world market prices, where the American standard of living does not control. All that product is sold at approximately the world market price less transportation charges, and very high transportation charges to seaboard, at that.

Then, also the grain gamblers use the farmer and his products for chips in their game, demoralizing the markets for his products. I doubt if there is much objection on the part of producers to ordinary hedging transactions, as in many cases these are of real value to the local elevators that buy the farmer's grain. But the disastrous truth is that selling by gamblers is greatly in excess of the selling for legitimate hedging accounts. Speculative selling is the dominant factor in forcing a decline in the wheat market. The market's two great abuses are short selling and excessive speculation.

THE CHICAGO BEAR RAID

Let us consider for a moment what occurred in that connection on the Chicago market when the "bear raid" started last May. In the first three days alone on that market the futures transactions were 97,400,000, 90,300,000, and 93,700,000 bushels, respectively, or almost twice as much wheat as the entire crop grown last year in the country's premier wheat State.

This hammering was continued until July 23, when July wheat closed at $1.18½—about where it remained through the rest of the month—as compared to $1.70½ on April 30. That was a decline of 52 cents a bushel, a loss of more than $75,000,000 to the farmers of Kansas alone.

It is time that gamblers should be eliminated from the market, and futures operations be limited strictly to legitimate hedging transactions. And this is exactly what I hope to do in a bill I now have before Congress. It declares that unbridled "short" selling and "long" buying are against the public interest, and endeavors to restrict such practices to the ordinary commercial needs of the hedgers.

I hope to get favorable action on this bill when Congress meets in special session, and I am sure I shall be able to do this if there is enough of a demand for it from the Wheat Belt.

The American farmer (and the Department of Agriculture, the agricultural colleges, and their experiment stations and extension divisions have helped him greatly) has made wonderful progress in production. He is utilizing the latest machinery and the latest knowledge and a great deal of initiative and business sense in solving production problems. In Kansas alone 50,000 tractors and 18,000 combines were used last year. The farmer is using electricity, steam, and gas engines.

But his merchandising can hardly be called a system. He has been depending and still depends on others to merchandise for him, and with a system of merchandising—including the grain gambling before mentioned—in which he takes no advantage and gives every advantage on pretty nearly every trade he makes.

It is true and greatly to his credit that he is working out his own selling problems, but has made only a start. In my judgment, we are going to see some wonderful changes in the merchandising of farm products in the next few years.

The larger merchandising units such as are proposed by Mr. Hoover, among others, are going to revolutionize the economic status of agriculture.

It is generally recognized and admitted that there is too large a "spread" between the producer and consumer. At present, where the consumer pays $1 for farm products, the farmer gets about 30 cents—when he is lucky—and the "passers on," including the grain gamblers, get the other 70 cents.

Agriculture, in my judgment, is going to work toward the "chain store" system of selling. The chain store has revolutionized retail merchandising. The farm marketing organizations are going to work finally into a similar system of wholesale merchandising of their products. Leaders of farm thought are not wasting their time fighting the chain-store idea. They are studying it. And they are going to utilize it.

In this I expect them to receive Government aid, and hold they are entitled to it. The Government helped the railroads merchandise their transportation at a profit—through the Esch-Cummins and other "regulatory acts." Government, so far through the States, helps the power interests merchandise their power—through rate-regulating bodies. The Government has helped labor merchandise its product—through the immigration act and 8-hour laws and sundry other acts.

FEDERAL RESERVE ACT CITED

The Government has aided financial merchandising—the sale of the use of finances—through the Federal reserve and other banking acts. And the Government is going to help the farmer merchandise his products through financial and legislative assistance for farmer-owned and farmer-controlled orderly marketing associations.

That brings us back to what the coming special session of Congress can do in the way of farm relief along what I consider sound economic lines.

Mr. Hoover told me not long ago that he considers the farm problem to be the supreme challenge to his administration, and he declared to me most emphatically that he would exert his best efforts to the end that agriculture might be put on a basis of equality with other industries.

Backing up and supplementing his own mental powers and ability Mr. Hoover will find that there will be a general disposition in Congress to forget about past differences and to cooperate with him on a broad basis. As a Senator and a member of the Agricultural Committee I consistently supported the McNary-Haugen program—not that it was perfect but because it seemed to be the best way in which a start might be made toward solution. I shall do my very best to help Mr. Hoover or anybody else to solve the farm problem, and I am sure that a safe majority of other Members of Congress are ready to make the same pledge.

I believe that it will be possible to make a much better application of the principle of adequate tariff protection to farm products, and I feel that real progress will be made along that line. I believe that an emergency tariff measure should be enacted that covers this schedule at once, especially for agricultural products on an import basis. We shall ask for an increase of duties on farm products to place them on a parity with industrial rates, or an average of 40 per cent ad valorem. The present basis of the agricultural tariff rates now averages 18 per cent ad valorem.

All this, of course, will be in line with Mr. Hoover's idea that "an adequate tariff is the foundation of farm relief."

Progress can be made with transportation problems, especially in the development of our rivers and of an adequate outlet from the Great Lakes through the St. Lawrence River. I feel, too, that it will be possible in the near future for the Interstate Commerce Commission to make some changes in the freight-rate structure of the country that will be helpful to both agriculture and industry.

In handling the problem of the surplus production of farm crops, Mr. Hoover's idea, as I get it, is to provide helpful Government aid, but not to the extent of having the Government engage in actual buying and selling. He also would eliminate the equalization-fee principle from any machinery he sets up, as I have suggested.

It is my understanding that Mr. Hoover's plan contemplates immediately proceeding to set up the agencies necessary to an immediate attack on the farm problem through the reorganization and reconstruction of the marketing machinery of farm products, the creation of a farm board, and the setting up of stabilization corporations and other agencies to deal at once with the problems of seasonal and annual surpluses of farm products.

He has pledged substantial assistance from the Federal Treasury, and he is not afraid to talk figures. He is willing to advance several hundreds of millions of dollars from the Treasury "for a workable program that will give to one-third of the population their fair share of the Nation's prosperity."

And I take it Mr. Hoover is in a position to exercise considerable influence on legislation in the next few years.

NO LEGISLATIVE CURE-ALL

Of course, there is no legislative cure-all for the farm problem. No sensible proponent of so-called "farm relief" legislation claims there is. Congress has passed legislation that bettered the condition of agriculture. The State legislatures, which this year are revising their taxation systems to relieve the land of the inequitable tax burden it carries under the antiquated general property tax, will help. The farmer himself, through his cooperative marketing organizations, through studying markets himself, through application of business methods to farming, has helped himself a lot.

But it does seem to me—and I note that Mr. Hoover, who is more of an economist than what we ordinarily term a politician, seems to have the same idea—that Congress can and should pass legislation to aid agriculture.

It seems to me there are three general phases of the situation to be considered, so long as we have the transportation act, the immigration law, the Federal reserve act, and the protective tariff as a part of our economic system.

Congress should consider, first, the practical way of protecting those agricultural products now on an import or marginal import basis—corn, dairy and beef products, livestock, etc. A higher protective tariff on these products would insure a domestic market free from competition of cheap products from abroad.

Then there are farm products on an export basis, such as in our own Kansas. Sooner or later we must face this problem squarely—how to give this class of farm products a protected market that will enable the farmer to produce and sell at a price which will allow him a profit, without pyramiding surpluses.

Third is the problem of marketing. At present, where the consumer pays $1 the producer gets 30 cents of it and the "passer-on"—including the market gambler—takes the other 70 cents. The present McNary bill, which will probably be the basis of farm relief legislation at the special session, seems to be in line with the recommendations of Mr. Hoover in his St. Louis speech. In my judgment it will assist materially in making for orderly marketing through the farmer cooperative marketing associations and stabilizing corporations.

A FEDERAL FARM BOARD

In fact, the present McNary bill is an orderly marketing bill. It provides for a Federal farm board to assist the farmer-owned and farmer-controlled cooperative marketing agencies, with a $300,000,000 revolving fund to supply the initial financing through loans.

This measure, if adopted, may assist also in handling the exportable surpluses to which I alluded. If it does not, we still will have that problem on our hands, though cheaper transportation charges will help solve the problem of the exportable surpluses. The inland waterways ultimately will be of great assistance, I am convinced.

In addition to these three general lines along which I believe the agricultural problems should be attacked, I also believe that market gambling in agricultural products should be curbed.

Unrestricted speculation in grain futures is bad. I am in favor of placing a restriction on speculation that will hold it within bounds without destroying the value that a futures market does possess. And agriculture must have lower transportation costs.

Summing up, I would say again the immediate governmental aid for agriculture as an industry should include:

Higher tariffs on farm products on an import basis, lower transportation costs, Government aid for cooperative marketing and guidance and assistance in orderly marketing through the cooperatives, curbing of grain gambling, and the equivalent of a protective tariff for surplus farm products on an export basis, coupled with a brake on overproduction.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE RULES—OPEN EXECUTIVE SESSIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. JONES. I desire to call up my motion to amend the rules which is on the table, being Senate Resolution 309.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, we are anxious to proceed with the consideration of the calendar this morning, and I wonder if the Senator from Washington will not let his resolution go over for another day or two?

Mr. JONES. I have no serious objection to doing that, but I want to call up the resolution pretty soon.

Mr. CURTIS. I may say to the Senator that there will be a motion to refer it to the Committee on Rules, and I prefer that the Senator should wait until to-morrow or Monday, if he would do so.

Mr. JONES. I will ask that the resolution go over for to-day, at any rate, and request that it may lie on the table. I do expect, however, to call it up at the very first convenient opportunity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. JONES rose.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I regret very much that my colleague allowed his resolution to go over for the reason——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I rose to give notice that I expect to call it up to-morrow.

Mr. DILL. I want to say just a word about it. I noted yesterday in the Evening News, a newspaper published in this city, an article by the United Press to the effect that the Louisville Times is recommending that Mr. Paul Mallon, United Press correspondent, who printed the names of Senators who are said to have voted for and against the confirmation of Mr. West, should be granted the Pulitzer prize as having done a very remarkable service in the newspaper world. A portion of this statement is so appropriate to the situation that I want to read it:

The Times congratulates the United Press and its Washington correspondent on the beat of the season.

But it's more than the beat of the season. Assuming its accuracy, the Times nominates Paul R. Mallon, Washington correspondent of the United Press, for one of the Pulitzer prizes which will be awarded in 1930.

The United Press presumably can not receive the gold medal "for the most disinterested and meritorious public service." That prize is offered to a newspaper. But Mr. Mallon qualified for the award of $1,000 for the best example of a reporter's work, the test being strict accuracy, terseness, and preferably "accomplishment for some public good commanding public attention and respect."

TRIED TO GO IN HOLE

What newspaper article could tell more, telling tersely how Senators voted, fondly believing themselves proceeding in "high-saving secrecy?" What column of news could accomplish more good than a column in which cowards of the United States Senate, who tried to go into a hole to vote upon seating a Cabinet officer, and tried to pull the hole in after them, were dragged swiftly into daylight, writhing and sputtering?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Washington indorse the statement that Senators are cowards?

Mr. DILL. I merely want to call attention to what is being said.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator indorse the statement?

Mr. DILL. I am not passing on that now.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should like to say that, so far as any vote I ever cast here is concerned, I am perfectly willing for everybody to know how I voted. Though I am not at liberty to tell it, I would be very glad indeed to be able to tell it, but the statement the Senator read is very extreme.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I am not discussing the merits of the statement. I am reading the article to call attention to what is being printed about this situation throughout the country. The article continues:

What "story" could command more public attention than one showing how each Senator voted when the power of the "greatest deliberative body" had been misused ignominiously in behalf of Senators who were trying to escape public scrutiny while voting?

I submit that when that sort of article is being printed, the resolution of my colleague ought at once to come up for consideration; we ought to take favorable action on it and not be postponing it from time to time. I do not know anything that is more important to the country and to the Senate than to have the resolution acted upon favorably.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator must be aware of the fact that there has been pending before the Committee on Rules a resolution proposing an amendment to the rules providing for open executive sessions in the case of all appointments to certain so-called policy-making commissions, such as the Federal Trade Commission, the Civil Service Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and United States Tariff Commission.

Mr. DILL. No doubt there is such a resolution pending, but I submit that if the resolution of my colleague goes to the Committee on Rules it will go to sleep there, as every resolution proposing similar action has gone to sleep in the past.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That has been my observation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, why does the Senator from Washington make that statement, when there was on the calendar for a whole session a proposed amendment to the rules reported out favorably by the Committee on Rules, but which no Senator called up during the time it was on the calendar? I refer to the Pittman resolution.

Mr. DILL. I was not aware that there had been reported any resolution to require executive sessions to be open to the public and the roll calls in executive session to be made public.

Mr. OVERMAN. There was such a resolution reported favorably from the Committee on Rules of the Senate, on which no action was asked. In view of that circumstance, why should the Senator make such a statement?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina indicate when that was?

Mr. OVERMAN. The resolution was on the calendar at the last session. I do not know where it is now.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will yield to me, I should like to say that such a resolution was reported and was on the calendar one whole session of the last Congress and no Senator moved to take it up.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas when the resolution was on the calendar—at what session?

Mr. CURTIS. During the last Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. During the last Congress, but not at the last session?

Mr. CURTIS. No; not at the last session.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is it not a fact that there has been pending before the Committee on Rules since the early days of the last session of this Congress a resolution providing for open executive session in certain cases introduced by me?

Mr. CURTIS. There has been.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has any action been taken on it?

Mr. CURTIS. No.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, in connection with this subject, I submit for printing in the RECORD at this point in my remarks an editorial from the Washington News entitled "Senate Secrecy."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington News, January 30, 1929]

SENATE SECRECY

Some years ago the American people got so excited about secret treaties that they fought a war on the slogan "Open covenants, openly arrived at." The idea was that the people's business was the people's business.

But while we have been trying to democratize the methods of world diplomacy, we seem to have overlooked some of our own archaic institutions. For instance, that rule for secret Senate sessions for consideration of executive nominations, providing expulsion of any Senator disclosing the debate or vote of these star-chamber proceedings.

This un-American rule has only one advantage. It puts a premium on political deals which need the protection of closed doors.

Whenever attempts have been made in the past to modernize this rule, the reform resolution has been referred to the Senate Rules Committee, sometimes called the Senate graveyard.

Fortunately the United Press, through its Senate correspondent, Paul R. Mallon, has forced the issue to the front again by publishing the proscribed secret roll call on the confirmation of Secretary of Interior West. Mallon may be subject to contempt proceedings. But his press colleagues are standing by him. So are many Senators, who are humiliated by the secrecy rules imposed upon them. Anyway, Mallon must have obtained his information from a Senator, just as other correspondents are accustomed to receiving regular though less complete information on such secret votes from Senators. So the Senate can not move against the press in this case without implicating its own Members—and that probably would be the end of the rule.

The secrecy rule may be thrown out in any case, as it should be. Senator JONES, Republican whip, has introduced a resolution providing that all sessions be open except on two-thirds vote of the Senate. That would reverse the present procedure. Now, executive sessions are secret unless two-thirds vote in secret for a public session. If two-thirds of the Senators, as provided by the Jones resolution, have to vote publicly before the Senate can resort to hush-hush proceedings, there will not be many secret sessions in the future.

Anything which is considered too confidential for the ears of the American public is apt to be precisely the public business in which citizens have and should have the most vital interest.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, no one has appeared before the committee to ask for any action upon the resolution referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts or any other, except one that was taken up immediately by the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

Mr. DILL. I yield the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. DILL. Very well.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask whether the news item from the Louisville Times to which reference has been made contained the record of the vote of Members of the Senate on the question of making public the proceedings in the West case or merely the roll call on his confirmation?

Mr. DILL. This particular news item does not contain either; it merely refers to the roll call which was printed.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not see the roll call as published by the United Press, and, therefore, I am not in a position to say whether it is correct or not; but did it contain the roll call on the various motions to make public the vote or merely the roll call on the question of confirmation?

Mr. DILL. It contained only what purported to be the roll call on the confirmation of Mr. West, and, as I stated the other day, under the rules of the Senate no Senator can rise to say whether it is correct or not.

Mr. GLASS. I say a Senator can. I say, to my personal knowledge, it was not correct.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it was scandalously incorrect.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I am not permitted to tell how we voted as to open executive session without including the Senator who has just read a secondhand lecture to the Senate; but everybody in the Senate knows my position on this question; everybody knows why the whole proceedings were not published; and whatever person on this floor, forgetting his honor, if he ever had any, revealed how the votes on one roll call were cast or approximately so—correctly or incorrectly—had the information about the others, and why did he not have the honor—well, I will not use that word because he did not have any; I started to say why did he not have the courtesy and the honor to make the whole proceedings public?

I know of no useful purpose, nor have I known any since I have been a Member of the Senate, served by secret sessions. There has been somebody here ever since I have been a Member of the Senate who has told the newspapers substantially what occurred. I think we ought to abolish the rule, because I do not want to put a premium on a man who has no honor; I do not want to afford him a market for his wares; and I take it for granted he got something for his disclosure. For I can not think even of a Benedict Arnold betraying his country without some kind of reward for doing so.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUCE. Why might it not be expedient at this time, or on the next occasion when we hold an executive session, to have the President of the Senate ask each and every Member of the Senate whether he divulged the vote, and then, if we discover the culprit, proceed to enforce the rule?

Mr. CARAWAY. The reason is this: A man who has no honor will not tell the truth if you ask him to stand up here and tell it. Somebody in the Senate, either an employee or a Member of it, knows who did it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I was about to suggest that a Senator who has some honor would object to being interrogated in that fashion.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; as if he did not have any. I am going to ask the leadership on the other side—and I do so because they ought to have some kind of control over the Senate—to have the whole proceedings in this case made public. It is nothing but common decency and honesty that it should be done, and I want it done.

Personally I have not any objection, and never have had, and, so help me Almighty God, I hope I never shall have any objection to anybody knowing how I vote on any question. Whenever a Senator is charged in the article which the Senator from Washington has read—and I thought it was halfway indorsed by him—is a coward, why he ought to get out of this body. If the statement is true that the majority of the Senators here are cowards, they ought to go; public place ought not to shelter cowards or liars. A man is not useful if he is a coward, because he has not the courage to do his duty, and if he has not any honor, of course, everybody agrees he has no place in public office.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I simply want to state by way of addition to the question I submitted to the Senator from Arkansas a moment ago that, of course, I am not to be understood as opposing the resolution of the Senator from Washington. On the contrary, I am unreservedly in favor of it. Ever since I have been a Member of this body I have again and again insisted on open executive sessions, and, like the Senator from Arkansas, I am glad to say I have never cast a vote in my life that I was not perfectly willing to be spread on the wings of the wind from Dan to Beersheba.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I was going to ask that we proceed with the consideration of the calendar, but the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] informs me that he desires a minute or so, and I yield to him.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not want that much time. I merely wish to state that I withdrew my request for the consideration of the resolution this morning in the hope of avoiding discussion. On to-morrow morning, however, I shall insist upon action on the resolution, either by vote of the Senate or otherwise.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII, beginning with Calendar No. 791, which is the number following the Nicaraguan joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the call of the calendar will proceed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does the Senator from Kansas ask that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII or by unanimous consent?

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the consideration of the calendar be proceeded with under Rule VIII. I think that is the better way. We have had the calendar up for unobjected bills upon two or three different occasions.

Mr. KING. Under the Senator's request, a bill when reached will be subject to objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

The first business on the calendar under the unanimous-consent agreement was the bill (S. 2097) to provide for the protection of municipal watersheds within the national forests.

Mr. BRATTON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3458) to create the reserve division of the War Department, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1625) to fix the salaries of the members of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1945) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1718) to authorize the President to detail engineers of the Bureau of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture to assist the governments of the Latin-American Republics in highway matters was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. PHIPPS. One of the changes would be the provision of a grazing board.

Mr. BRUCE. Let it go over.

Mr. PHIPPS. There are other items that would be changed, and I do not think the bill could be properly considered under the 5-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

THE CENSUS

The bill (H. R. 393) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, did the Senator from Maryland object to that bill?

Mr. BRUCE. I have offered an amendment, and if the bill is going to be taken up for consideration I should like to bring it up, but I hope the Senator will not bring it up to-day. It will take some time to discuss it.

Mr. JONES. I had hoped that possibly we might adopt the amendments recommended by the committee, anyhow.

Mr. BRUCE. Perhaps if I were so complaisant as to unite in the adoption of the committee amendments I might find it a hard task to secure the enactment of my own amendment. I have an amendment, too. I would prefer, I will say to the Senator from Washington, that both amendments should come up at the same time, and share the same fate, whether good or bad.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator prefers that this bill go over, I will not insist.

Mr. BRUCE. I wish the Senator could make it the unfinished business. I think he probably could.

Mr. JONES. I can not do that to-day.

Mr. BRUCE. No.

Mr. JONES. But I want to get it up very soon.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not want to obstruct the bill in the least. Of course, the bill is of the very highest degree of importance; but so is the amendment I have offered to it, because it contemplates nothing less than bringing the enumerators or field agents of one sort or another who deal with the next census under the shelter of the Federal merit system of appointment.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I have also offered an amendment to this bill to include in the census taking the taking of data on unemployment to ascertain the number of unemployed. I was hoping that the committee would accept the amendment without any discussion.

Mr. JONES. I should like to do so. There are several of these amendments that can be dealt with in conference, I think, far better than here on the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I was going to ask that the measure go over.

Mr. BRUCE. I think it had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. BRUCE. I dislike very much, however, to be put in the position of apparently obstructing the bill. I have no disposition to do that.

AMENDMENT OF IMMIGRATION LAWS

The bill (S. 1437) to subject certain immigrants, born in countries of the Western Hemisphere, to the quota under the immigration laws was announced as next in order.

Mr. PHIPPS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senator from Colorado and other Senators who are opposed to this measure would let us have a vote on it; but I realize that they will not if they can prevent it. The friends of this bill have been willing to accept certain amendments allowing two years for these persons to arrange their business affairs. I am afraid we are not going to get any agreement from them; and I put the Senators who are not for this measure on notice that those who are in favor of it are going to ask the steering committee to set a day for the consideration of this bill. It has been indorsed by the American Federation of Labor, the American Legion, the Auxiliary of the American Legion, and a number of patriotic societies.

Mr. KING. Of course, that means that we ought to pass it.

Mr. PHIPPS. I objected because I did not believe the bill could be properly disposed of under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Utah has an amendment that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] drew, and we will accept that if Senators will not object to the consideration of this bill. The Senator from Utah is willing, as I understand, and I hope there will be no other Senator who will object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. The bill of the Senator from Georgia is a very important one. Thousands and tens of thousands of people are coming over into this country from Mexico every year, presumably to work temporarily, and they slip into the cities, the big industrial centers of the country, and are swallowed up in our population. No account is given of them, and they are never naturalized; and through that very source tens of thousands of foreigners are coming into this country against the will and against the best interests of the people of the United States.

I hope we can get action on the Senator's bill. I should like to hear the amendment read and see if we can not vote on it to-day. It will stop a great evil.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Objection has been made that the bill can not be considered under the 5-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 2204) to amend section 284 of the Judicial Code of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. If it is in order for a motion to be made to take up this bill, I hope the Senator from Georgia will make it. I do not know just what rule we are working under.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are working under Rule VIII. That motion may be made.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Utah thinks that the beet-sugar people, who are opposing this bill in the Middle West, will agree to the amendment if he can see them, and save any objection.

Mr. BLACK and Mr. HEFLIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. Personally, I should like to see the bill pass without amendment. I believe there are enough votes to pass it without amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I think so, too, I will say to the Senator from Alabama; but those opposed to this measure, if we take it up, can talk until 2 o'clock, which will prevent a vote, and it will be a waste of time. There are other Senators here who are interested in other measures, and I do not like to deny them consideration, when taking all the time of the morning hour would not help us get the bill passed but would prevent the passage of many bills under unanimous-consent agreement. However, I put Senators on notice that we are going to get a vote on this bill at an early date. I will say to the Senator from Alabama, that if necessary I shall make a motion every time we can do so under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator wants to let it go over until another occasion, and give notice now that he will move to take it up——

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, if those who are opposing this measure do not present an amendment that we are willing to accept, we will make a fight for the present bill, but amend it so as to include Central and South America as well as Mexico, so that there will be no objection on the part of the Mexicans that they were singled out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 2204 is now before the Senate.

Mr. METCALF. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, is that the bill of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CAPPER. It is; yes.

SEVERAL SENATORS. It is a House bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator and I discussed a proposed amendment to it. Did the Senator make up his mind with reference to it?

Mr. CAPPER. Would the Senator like to have it go over?

Mr. HEFLIN. Let it go over.

Mr. CARAWAY. Just a moment. I am not insisting on the bill going over. I think it ought to carry the amendment to which I have referred. I discussed the matter with the Senator from Kansas, and I thought he was waiting until he could make up his mind with reference to it. I thought possibly the Senator would agree to the amendment.

Mr. CAPPER. The amendment is under consideration. If the Senator from Arkansas insists on the amendment, I think the bill should go over.

Mr. CARAWAY. Suppose we let it go over, then. I think the amendment ought to be on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under objection, the bill will be passed over.

HAY GROWERS OF TEXAS

The bill (S. 4818) for the relief of hay growers in Brazoria, Galveston, and Harris Counties, Tex., was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill was considered on January 24 last, and an amendment offered by the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is pending.

Mr. BRUCE. Let it go over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that this bill authorizes the Comptroller General to examine and settle the claims of hay growers in certain counties in Texas for losses in connection with the quarantine imposed by the Federal Government and the State of Texas on account of the foot-and-mouth disease among cattle in 1925. The State of Texas has already paid its half of the indemnity for the losses.

Mr. BRUCE. I always find it difficult to oppose the Senator from Texas, and I withdraw my objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment to strike out the period at the end of the bill and to insert a colon and a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to examine and settle, on the basis of facts and figures to be found and reported by the Secretary of Agriculture, the claims of hay growers in Brazoria, Galveston, and Harris Counties, Tex., who were prevented during the year 1925 from harvesting their hay because of quarantine restrictions against the spread of the hoof and mouth disease: Provided, That the allowance made on any such claim shall not exceed the amount paid thereon by the Livestock Sanitary Commission of Texas, pursuant to an act of the State legislature approved October 6, 1926. There is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient amount, not to exceed $218,177.50, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay such of the claims as may be allowed by the Comptroller General: Provided, That no part of the amount of any item appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum which in the aggregate exceeds 10 per cent of the amount of any item appropriated in this act on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I ask the Senator from Texas by what authority Mr. McCarl may determine the liability of the Federal Government?

Mr. SHEPPARD. An act was passed during the last session of the Congress authorizing him to submit, with his recommendation, certain claims to the Congress where no appropriation was already available for the payment of such claims.

Mr. KING. Has an act been passed establishing liability on the part of the Federal Government because certain farmers have lost their hay crops? I might say that in my State we have lost considerable of our hay crops because of injudicious actions of some officials.

Mr. SHEPPARD. This was on account of the quarantine. The hay had been infected, just as animals had been infected. Animals and materials were destroyed under authority of existing laws relating to quarantine operations to prevent the spread of the infection throughout the Nation.

Mr. KING. It seems to me it is rather a remarkable procedure that the Federal Government should be held liable in a case of this kind. I think it would better go over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill authorizes the comptroller to examine and settle this case.

Mr. KING. I will be glad to talk with the Senator about it before the next call of the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under objection, the bill will be passed over.

That the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby authorized and directed to recognize as valid the assignments of military bounty land warrant No. 61756 for 160 acres, issued June 19, 1849, under the act of February 11, 1847 (9 Stat. 123), to John Barman, notwithstanding the provisions of section 9 of said act.

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not see the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in his seat. It is his bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thought possibly that was the reason for the objection. I will be very glad to state the nature of the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama withdraws his objection and the Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Under the existing law subpœnas for witnesses can not be issued to compel their attendance for the trial of a lawsuit if they live out of the district and more than a hundred miles from the place where the court is held. The witness can not be compelled to attend a court session.

Mr. BRUCE. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 5193) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint an additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of the State of Pennsylvania, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 8551) to create an additional judge in the district of South Dakota, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLEASE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ADDITIONAL JUDGES IN NEW YORK

The bill (H. R. 9200) to provide for the appointment of three additional judges of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLEASE. Let that go over.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I move that that bill be taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I do not object to the passage of any bill creating a judgeship for any State when its representatives request it, and where there has been sufficient showing to that end. But I do want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that on the calendar there will be found Senate bill 5193, creating an additional judgeship in Pennsylvania; House bill 8551, creating an additional judgeship in South Dakota; House bill 9200, providing for three additional judgeships in New York; House bill 12811, providing for the appointment of an additional district judge for the eastern and western districts of South Carolina; House bill 8295, for the appointment of an additional judge for the ninth judicial circuit; and House bill 14659, providing for the appointment of two additional judges for the eastern district of New York. That makes reports on bills providing for nine judges. The reports in the cases of eight of those judges are favorable.

The one unfavorable report is the one on the bill which asks for the appointment of one district judge in South Carolina, the request for the additional judge being made by the district judges of South Carolina, the United States district attorneys, and by the State Bar Association of South Carolina, and by other organizations.

In addition to these requests and the reasons given by those making the requests, the House of Representatives, after a most thorough examination into this matter through its Committee on the Judiciary, unanimously passed the bill creating this judgeship in South Carolina.

The Judiciary Committee of the House itself carefully examined into the matter. They held it before them for quite a while. Their report was unanimous. The House of Representatives passed the bill unanimously. There was no complaint about it, no objection to it; it came over to the Senate, and it was referred to a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

I am informed that since 1926, 26 new judgeships have been created in the United States. Adding to that 26 the 8 here provided for would make 34 judgeships which would have been established within a very short time. Not a single judgeship has been refused that has been asked for, not a State has been refused that I have heard anything about.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BLEASE. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. On my docket there is no report accompanying this bill. Is there any printed report accompanying the bill?

Mr. BLEASE. I am going to read the report made by the House committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not see the report in the file.

Mr. BLEASE. There is none from the Senate committee, but I am going to read two reports made by the House committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no report from the Senate committee?

Mr. BLEASE. None at all; the bill was simply adversely reported.

With these 34 judgeships being established, as I have said, with no objection on the part of anybody, why is it that South Carolina is picked out and made the exception out of the whole United States of America? No reason is given for that; there is simply an adverse report.

We have not asked for the establishment of an additional circuit. I ask the Senate to remember that this bill does not provide for the creation of another circuit; it does not provide for the appointment of a single additional official; it does not ask for any additional marshals or district attorneys. It asks only for a judgeship, in order that the congested condition of the dockets in South Carolina may be relieved.

I shall not take the time to read all of it, but I want to read in part the report of Mr. GRAHAM from the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives. I am informed that he is the chairman of that committee. It is as follows:

> The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 7391, after hearing and consideration, reports the same favorably with amendments and recommends that the bill as amended be passed.

Then follows a statement from Congressman FRED H. DOMINICK, a Member of Congress from the State of South Carolina.

Following that is a letter from Judge Ernest F. Cochran, who was appointed United States judge by Mr. Coolidge, and I want to say right here and now, notwithstanding the fact that he is a Republican, he is a gentleman. He is a Republican to the manner born. His people for generations before him were Republicans, on his father's side and on his mother's side. He is a Republican from principle. He is a clean, fair, straight, honest man. In his letter to the Attorney General of the United States he sets out the necessity for the extra judgeship.

Following that is a letter from Judge H. H. Watkins, who was appointed by Mr. Woodrow Wilson, and what I said about Judge Cochran, save as to his being a Republican, I can truthfully say about Judge Watkins.

I have absolutely no personal interest in the bill. I would not accept a judgeship if it were offered to me and the Senate would unanimously confirm me. I have no particular friend picked out for the position. I am simply requesting of the Senate to deal with my State as it has dealt with other States and to take the word of the two United States judges who wrote these letters. Judge Cochran, writing to the Department of Justice, sets out very fully the situation. It would take too much of the time of the Senate to read it all, but I wish to read just a part of it:

> The problem in reference to the business of Federal courts, I know, is a very difficult one. I have studied conditions in South Carolina for more than a year, and upon full reflection I have come to the conclusion that the best solution of the problem is the creation of three districts, to be known as the western, middle, and eastern districts, and arranged so as to form a compact district in the northwestern portion of the State, one through the middle of the State, and one in the eastern part along the seaboard.

That is signed by Judge Ernest F. Cochran.

Later we decided that instead of asking for the three districts we would only ask for the additional judgeship.

Following that is a table submitted by Judge Cochran, which would be too long to read, setting out fully the cases pending—criminal, civil, bankruptcy, and naturalization—the condition of his entire docket, and showing why it is impossible for him to handle the business. He is on the seacoast. He has a great deal of admiralty business. He has a great deal of naturalization business. Of course, a great many more prohibition cases and civil cases besides of various kinds come before him. He sets out briefly the necessity for the additional judge.

Following that is another letter from Judge Cochran, in which he said in part:

The necessity for relief of the present congestion in the district courts of South Carolina has been recognized by the State bar association at its annual meeting of 1925, and many of the local bar associations in South Carolina have indorsed my efforts to try and get some relief. At this time there are five places for the holding of court in the western district and four places in the eastern district. Should we have an additional judge the situation would be greatly relieved, although, of course, it would not be as satisfactory in every respect as an additional district.

This legislation received the approval of the House on June 8, 1926.

In addition to that I have another report filed in the House on the 30th of April, 1928, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 12811, after consideration, reports the same favorably and recommends that the bill do pass.

A similar bill was reported from this committee on January 20, 1927, which set up statements made in the hearings on H. R. 10821 and showed the necessity for the appointment of this additional judge, as will be seen by reference to Report No. 1827, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session, accompanying H. R. 7391.

This legislation received the approval of the House on June 8, 1926, when it passed H. R. 10821.

Since that report, and in addition thereto, there is printed herewith and made a part of this report a letter from Hon. Ernest F. Cochran, judge of the eastern district of South Carolina, dated March 8, 1928, and a letter from Hon. H. H. Watkins, judge of the western district of South Carolina, dated March 10, 1928, showing the necessity for the appointment of this additional judge.

Then follows Judge Cochran's letter, which is too long to read at length, but I want to call attention to this statement in it:

In order to relieve the situation in this district, I have been fortunate enough to obtain the assistance of Hon. Clarence Hale, retired United States judge, of Maine, who has been here for over two weeks, and will remain several weeks more. We are sitting contemporaneously, hearing cases every day, in an effort to relieve the civil docket. Of course, this is helpful, but is only temporary.

Allow me to call your attention again to the fact that mere figures are very misleading. The real point to be considered is how much work the judge has to do and how much time is required. There is no doubt in the minds of those familiar with the situation here that there is too much business for one judge.

Respectfully,

ERNEST F. COCHRAN,
United States District Judge.

Following that is a letter of date March 10, 1928, written by His Honor Judge Watkins. These letters are both very strong letters. They set out the facts, the figures, the conditions, and the necessity for the relief asked. Judge Watkins said in part:

I am informed that it has been suggested that an additional judge should not be provided for South Carolina for the reason that the dockets of this State are not congested as in other States. It is difficult to understand how such an argument could be seriously advanced. If the confidence of the public in procuring prompt and exact justice in the courts is to be preserved it can only be accomplished by an assurance that he who has a just cause may assert it in the courts not only eventually but promptly. I know of no line of business in which it is not recognized that additional and adequate help should be provided to meet its expansion, and it would seem that if additional help is imperative to the prompt and proper administration of justice that it should be provided in each case without comparison with any other. This must necessarily be true unless the Government is unable to incur the expense.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BLEASE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has stated that the judges are not sufficient in number, in the district of which he speaks, to try all the cases that are now pending, even with an extra judge there sitting contemporaneously with the regular judge. I was wondering how much of that situation is due to the fact that there are violations of the prohibition law in the State of South Carolina. Can the Senator give me an approximation of the number of cases and the relation of prohibition cases to that number?

Mr. BLEASE. I can read from Judge Cochran's figures. There were 515 criminal cases on July 1, 1924, and 633 on July 1, 1925.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is that the number of untried cases?

Mr. BLEASE. Yes; untried. The number of civil cases pending July 1, 1924, was 209, bankruptcy cases 380, naturalization cases 52. The number of cases pending July 1, 1925, was 1,264.

Mr. TYDINGS. But does the Senator know of the criminal cases how many are for violations of the prohibition law?

Mr. BLEASE. I could not tell about that, but my own judgment is that there are a good many.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the senior Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BLEASE. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator will recollect that I brought out the fact at the last session of Congress from the Charleston News and Courier that it is fair to compute that one still had been broken up for every 500 or 600 inhabitants in the State of South Carolina. I do not remember the exact figures, but I think those are approximately correct.

Mr. BLEASE. I expect that is true. I read in the South Carolina papers this morning, in the Charleston News and Courier, that they had broken up three or four stills yesterday. I also read that they had tried a case down there last week of a State senator indicted for conspiracy along with some others. They were promptly acquitted by the jury in 45 minutes. The janitor said that he had a great deal of trouble in getting the "dead soldiers" out of the building. That he found one or two jugs; that there were "empties" all over the place; and that he hoped to God there would not be any more prohibition cases tried in Charleston at least until he could have an opportunity to clean up the courthouse after the recent event.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not know of any community more entitled to an additional Federal judge, or half a dozen more Federal judges, than is South Carolina, and I shall be glad to vote for the Senator's bill.

Mr. BLEASE. I thank the Senator.

I ask at this time that the two reports to which I have referred, and from which I have quoted briefly, may be printed in the RECORD at this point in connection with my remarks, in order to show the exact conditions in my State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The reports are as follows:

[H. Rept. No. 1827, 69th Cong., 2d sess.]

ONE ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE EASTERN AND WESTERN DISTRICTS, SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 7391):

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 7391, after hearing (serial 13) and consideration, reports the same favorably with amendments, and recommends that the bill as amended do pass.

The committee amendments are as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one additional district judge for the eastern and western districts of South Carolina.

"SEC. 2. That said judge shall reside in one of the districts for which he is appointed."

Amend the title to read as follows:

"To provide for the appointment of one additional district judge for the eastern and western districts of South Carolina."

There is printed herewith and made a part of this report the statement of Hon. FRED H. DOMINICK, a Member of Congress from the State of South Carolina, which shows the necessity for the appointment of this additional judge.

STATEMENT BY REPRESENTATIVE FRED H. DOMINICK

"Under the permission and leave courteously extended at the hearings on the Graham bill, providing for additional district judges, and after notice of an amendment in committee to provide for an additional district judge for the eastern and western districts of South Carolina, I wish to submit the following:

"Mr. GASQUE, of South Carolina, and I have each introduced bills in the present Congress providing for an additional district for South Carolina, but owing to the fact that neither of these bills have met with the approval of the Department of Justice they will not be pressed at this time. It is hoped, however, that some relief may be given to the situation by the creation of one additional judge to serve both districts. The reasons for the creation of an additional district apply with equal if not greater force to the creation of an additional judge, and in the consideration of this matter the Department of Justice called upon the Hon. Henry H. Watkins, United States district judge for the western district of South Carolina and the Hon. Ernest F. Cochran, United States district judge for the eastern district of South Carolina, asking for their opinions as to the necessity or desirability of creating the proposed additional district and both replied in telegrams, copies of which follow, that a new district is not only advisable but necessary."

The ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

Your telegram requesting views proposed additional district South Carolina. Business of this district has steadily increased for 10 years. This increase largely in civil business, especially equity and bankruptcy cases, which requires great deal of time. Business in arreas has steadily increased and in 1925 nearly two and one-half times what it was in 1918.

More business now than one judge can properly dispatch. This is not due to liquor violations. My time is fully occupied, and careful estimate shows only about 25 per cent actual time devoted to liquor cases. Statistics covering seven years show condition is not temporary. Am strongly of opinion there is necessity for relief in interest of public. Think proposed division of State into three districts, eastern, middle, and western, is best solution of problem and would probably take care of situation for some time. Mere figures are misleading. It is actual time necessary for work that should govern, but will send you statistical data as soon as same can be prepared.

ERNEST F. COCHRAN,
United States District Judge.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

Your wire date. Have carefully studied and discussed with Judge Cochran, of eastern district, the subject of creating third district. I regard its creation as not only advisable but necessary to the prompt and proper transaction of the business of the Federal courts for this State. Letter follows.

H. H. WATKINS, District Judge.

Under date of February 5, 1926, Judge Cochran wrote the Department of Justice as follows:

"I received your telegram of the 4th instant, requesting my views as to the necessity or desirability of proposed additional district for South Carolina, and immediately sent you telegram, copy of which I inclose.

"Your telegram did not ask for any letter or any data, but in view of the situation in this district, which has been upon my mind for some time, giving me a great deal of concern, I deem it advisable to write you briefly in reference to the matter and send you certain data.

"I was appointed district judge of this district and qualified in November, 1923, upon the retirement of the late Judge Smith. I found quite a congestion of business and that the business in arrears had been steadily increasing for some years. Judge Smith lived only one year after his retirement, and during that time I had his assistance to some extent, and with that assistance and by hard work we were able to clear up a great many old cases and almost, but not quite, keep up with the business. In spite of all that I could do the arrears increased. According to the figures I send you it would appear that in the last two years there has been a slight decrease of business, and that the business in arrears has not increased much. But this is more apparent than real, from the fact that during this period I cleared up a large number of old cases and the business now in arrears, for the main part, consists of cases which can not be stricken off peremptorily, but must be tried. I am satisfied that I will not be able alone to dispose of anything like as much businss as I have in the last two years with the assistance of Judge Smith, and the business in arrears is sure to increase still further.

"I inclose you a statement taken from the Attorney General's reports of the number of cases pending, commenced, and terminated in this district for the years 1918–1920, inclusive. From this statement you will see that there has been a heavy increase in the business and that this increase has been steady. You will also note that the increase has been almost entirely in the civil business. It is the civil business that requires the time of the court. It is clear from these statistics, and I am satisfied, that this condition is not a temporary one. The decrease for the last two years, as stated, is more apparent than real, and is due to the striking off of a large number of old cases and to the fact that I had Judge Smith's assistance for one year. This statement does not include naturalization, special proceedings, and motions.

"I also inclose you a statement of business in this district during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, exclusive of special proceedings and motions. You will note from this statement that during that year the civil cases were reduced, but it was at the expense of the criminal business, the arrears of which increased. In this connection, I desire to say that I have found that the civil business was so badly in arrears and litigants were clamoring so for hearings that I was compelled to devote more time to that part of the business and made some little reduction in the arrears. I think it is evident from this statement that there is more work in this district than one judge can properly dispatch, and you will note from the recapitulation that the business in arrears on July 1, 1925, numbered 1,264 cases and proceedings. It would take a year's work to clear up this pending business, if nothing new came in at all.

"However, there is every indication that the civil business will continue to increase. For the last five months my time has been fully occupied and the lawyers have been pressing me for hearings in equity and bankruptcy matters, which I have been compelled in numbers of cases to postpone, on account of more urgent matters.

"As stated to you in my telegram, mere figures are misleading and the amount of time that the judge is compelled to give to the work should determine the policy to be pursued. However, I am quite satisfied that the data submitted will upon figures alone show the necessity for some remedy of this situation. In addition to this, it should be stated that in the figures submitted, cases upon which the grand jury finds no bill and cases sent up by the commissioners which do not result in a true bill or the filing of an information, are not included, although I understand that in many districts such cases are included in the statistics. In this district also, in nearly all cases, all persons concerned in one criminal transaction are indicted together, and the same is counted as one case. The figures do not include proceedings for forfeiture of automobiles in prohibition cases, which are counted in as ancillary to the criminal cases in which they arise, although I understand that in some districts they are counted as separate cases. In the matter of petitions by receivers of national banks for the sale of assets or the compromise of debts, each national bank is counted as presenting one case only, although there have been in this district a large number of such matters presented by the various receivers of national banks. Of course this class of matter is ex parte and does not require very much time, but still there are a number of them, and they do take some time. Neither, of course, do the figures include any of what may be termed the administrative duties of the judge, which, as you are aware, are quite numerous.

"The problem in reference to the business of Federal courts, I know, is a very difficult one. I have studied conditions in South Carolina for more than a year and upon full reflection I have come to the conclusion that the best solution of the problem is the creation of three disrticts to be known as the western, middle, and eastern districts, and arranged so as to form a compact district in the northwestern portion of the State, one through the middle of the State, and one in the eastern part along the seaboard.

"Respectfully,

"ERNEST F. COCHRAN,
"United States District Judge."

Under date of March 6, 1926, Judge Cochran wrote the Attorney General as follows:

"I received your letter of February 11, 1926 (initialed DDC–42M 11–10), stating that the department has received my telegram and letter relative to the proposed additional district in South Carolina, but that the department had not felt that there was need for an additional district in this State, basing its judgment on a comparison of the Federal court business here with Federal court business in other 2-district States having two judges, and that you had so stated to the Judiciary Committee, but had transmitted to them copy of my letter and inclosures and copy of letter from Judge Watkins upon the same subject.

"I regret that the department could not see its way clear to recommend the creation of an additional district. Your letter did not call for any further expression from me upon the subject, but, in view of conditions in this district, I am taking the liberty of making the suggestion to you that the situation might be relieved by the creation of an additional judge, either for the whole State, or, if that should not be deemed advisable, an additional judge for the eastern district. My own opinion is that it is better to have an additional district, so that each judge may be held directly responsible for the conduct of the business in his own district. But I realize that the matter has several practical aspects, and that, for other reasons, it may not be advisable to create new districts. I was district attorney before the State was divided into two districts and was district attorney for the western district before my appointment as judge of the eastern district. I have made a very careful study of the situation in the State as a whole, and there is a real need, in the interests of the public, that something should be done to relieve the pressure of business. In this connection allow me to say that while, of course, I have some personal interest in being relieved to some extent of the very heavy work that is upon me under present conditions, nevertheless my main object is in the interest of the Government and of the people, that the department and Congress may have the facts of the situation, in order that such action may be taken as may be deemed advisable. I feel quite sure, therefore, that you will understand that the spirit in which this letter is written is simply in an effort to assist your department in endeavoring to formulate a correct remedy for the situation.

"Respectfully,

"ERNEST F. COCHRAN,
"United States District Judge."

"The necessity for relief of the present congestion in the district courts of South Carolina has been recognized by the State bar association at its annual meeting of 1925, and many of the local bar associations in South Carolina have indorsed my efforts to try and get some relief. [H. Rept. No. 1427, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE EASTERN AND WESTERN DISTRICTS, SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. DOMINICK, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 12811):

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 12811, after consideration, reports the same favorably and recommends that the bill do pass.

A similar bill was reported from this committee on January 20, 1927, which set out statements made at the hearings on H. R. 10821 and showed the necessity for the appointment of this additional judge, as will be seen by reference to Report No. 1827, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session, accompanying H. R. 7391.

This legislation received the approval of the House on June 8, 1926, when it passed H. R. 10821.

Since that report, and in addition thereto, there is printed herewith and made a part of this report a letter from the Hon. Ernest F. Cochran, judge of the eastern district of South Carolina, dated March 8, 1928, and a letter from Hon. H. H. Watkins, judge of the western district of South Carolina, dated March 10, 1928, showing the necessity for the appointment of this additional judge.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
EASTERN DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Charleston, March 8, 1928.

Hon. FRED H. DOMINICK,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am in receipt of your letter of the 1st instant requesting me to make a statement relative to conditions in this district, which you would like to use before the Judiciary Committee in regard to the proposed additional district judge for South Carolina.

My letter and telegram of February 5, 1926, to the Attorney General, with accompanying statement of the cases and business arising in this district from 1918 to June 30, 1925, were presented by you to the Judiciary Committee of the Sixty-ninth Congress at the hearing of April 6, 1926, on H. R. 10821, Serial 13, and all the data in this statement are, I presume, still available. Since the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, the conditions have not grown better to any practical extent. There has been a decrease in the number of criminal cases arising since then, but this decrease is entirely in prohibition cases, mainly of a minor nature. This decrease has been due to the fact that I have discouraged the bringing into this court of the minor liquor cases and have urged officials to have them presented, as far as practicable, in the State courts. Another reason is that, owing to certain developments here, the details of which it will not be necessary to trouble you with, very few prohibition agents have been at work in this district until a few months ago. I am informed, however, that they are now very active, and that there will be another flood of liquor cases in this court before long.

As to the criminal cases, aside from prohibition cases, there has been an actual increase in the number of this class of cases. Moreover, the criminal cases are becoming more and more of a serious nature, and more of them contested, and they require more time than formerly. There have been a number of bankruptcy prosecutions, which have taken considerable time. You will recall that at Columbia recently I tried one of the cases growing out of the Beaufort Bank transactions, which took me nearly six weeks, and during the whole time I was trying that case I was holding court from six to seven actual working hours a day. Of course, that case was an exceptional one, and we are not likely to have such a long case again soon; though there are other cases growing out of the same transactions which will have to be tried and will consume considerable time.

The number of prosecutions for motor-vehicle thefts under the Dyer Act is increasing in this district. In fact, all kinds of criminal cases of a serious nature are on the increase.

As to the civil business, there has been an increase in the number of new cases arising. It is the civil business, as a rule, of course, that requires the time of the judge. I find each year that the civil cases arising in this district are taking more and more time for the hearing of them.

Without troubling you with further details, the fact remains that there is still in this district each year more work than one judge ought to be called upon to transact if the parties are given a full and fair hearing and the due consideration of their cases to which they are entitled.

In order to relieve the situation in this district, I have been fortunate enough to obtain the assistance of Hon. Clarence Hale, retired United States judge, of Maine, who has been here for over two weeks and will remain for several weeks more. We are sitting contemporaneously, hearing cases every day, in an effort to relieve the civil docket. Of course, this is helpful, but is only temporary.

Allow me to call your attention again to the fact that mere figures are very misleading. The real point to be considered is how much work the judge has to do and how much time is required. There is no doubt in the minds of those familiar with the situation here that there is too much business for one judge.

Respectfully,

ERNEST E. COCHRAN,
United States District Judge.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
Anderson, S. C., March 10, 1928.

Hon. FRED H. DOMINICK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DOMINICK: I was away from home in attendance upon the Spartanburg court when your letter of March 1 reached here, returning to my office on Tuesday night of this week, and I am now taking the earliest opportunity of replying.

I am apprehensive that it will be impossible in the compass of this necessarily brief letter to give you any adequate statement of the conditions which prevail in this district so as to show the imperative necessity of additional help.

The published records of the Attorney General's office will furnish some indication of the nature and amount of the business transacted by the court, and what I shall say will be supplementary to those records. By way of preliminary, I desire to say that the burden of the work will best be understood by calling attention to the fact that for several years the trial of jury cases has engaged the attention of the court for approximately 20 weeks out of each year. Under a standing rule of the court, and both for the sake of economy and in order to render the attendance of the jurors less onerous, it is required that all preliminary motions, demurrers, etc., preparatory to the trial of the cases on their merits must be disposed of in chambers prior to the convening of the court for jury trials. We hold regularly both morning and afternoon sessions while these trials are in progress.

You will see, therefore, the tax upon both the physical and mental reserve of the presiding judge in conducting jury trials alone. In addition to these, is not only the large volume of routine business but also the almost daily hearings of cases in equity, review of bankruptcy cases, and preparation of opinions, as well as the disposition of demurrers and motions of varied character. Until recently, by the method adopted, I have been able to dispose of the business of the court with reasonable promptness. Within the last year the business has greatly accumulated and a great many emergent matters have been the subject of unfortunate delay. The rapid development of corporate enterprises in my district, together with the growing tendency to draw litigation into the Federal courts, indicates that our business will greatly increase in the immediate future.

You are already aware of the fact that my health has been seriously impaired under the strain of continuing the work without opportunity for recuperation or proper hospital treatment. While I conceive it my duty to carry on to the limit under existing conditions, I can not escape the view that, ignoring all personal considerations, it is unfortunate for the administration of justice to have cases tried by a judge who is not in excellent condition both physically and mentally, and that is especially unfortunate to have a condition in which for lack of time a judge must determine important questions without opportunity for adequate research or mature consideration.

I am informed that it has been suggested that an additional judge should not be provided for South Carolina for the reason that the dockets of this State are not congested as in other States. It is difficult to understand how such an argument could be seriously advanced. If the confidence of the public in procuring prompt and exact justice in the courts is to be preserved, it can only be accomplished by an assurance that he who has a just cause may assert it in the courts not only eventually but promptly. I know of no line of business in which it is not recognized that additional and adequate help should be provided to meet its expansion, and it would seem that if additional help is imperative to the prompt and proper administration of justice that it should be provided in each case without comparison with any other. This must necessarily be true unless the Government is unable to incur the expense.

In this connection may I not call your attention to the fact that it is generally recognized as the scandal of American courts that causes are so delayed. May I not suggest also that the increase in crime and open defiances of law, which are more and more appalling to law-abiding citizens with the passage of each month, may be at least in some measure attributable to the delays of the courts and the inadequate provisions which are being made for them. I think that you are already aware not only of the general situation which prevails here but also of the utter lack of comportable or even adequate quarters in which my courts must be held. We are compelled to hold courts at five places, in only one of which we have a Federal building, and that of a most antiquated type.

With only one clerk's office for the entire district and with only two small rooms allotted to the clerk in which all the records of the district must be kept, the four deputies of the clerk with their desks and typewriters are herded in one small room subject to the distractions at all times of the numerous persons who have business with the office and during the courts at that place overcrowded at that time with the passing in and out of lawyers, litigants, jurors, and witnesses. Some time ago I endeavored to procure an additional room for the clerk's office and one which, under the original design of the building and situated upon the same floor as the quarters of the court, was designed for and allotted for the use of the court. This office, however, was occupied by an official of the Post Office Department, and we were unable to procure its use for the reason that the official was unwilling to go to another floor, although he was frequently absent from his office and left it unoccupied for days at a time. It has occurred to me that so long as the provisions for the places for transacting the business of the courts are made incidental to and subordinate to that of some other department and until adequate provisions be made both for comfortable places in which to hold the courts and for an adequate force to insure the prompt disposition of all their business, the public will be disposed to regard the administration of justice as an orphan unworthy of respect. The respect of the public must necessarily be measured in large degree by the consideration shown by the Government itself.

If there is any special recapitulation which you may desire to be taken from the records, I will be glad to have it tabulated and forwarded to you by the clerk.

Yours very truly,

H. H. WATKINS,
United States District Judge.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BLEASE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just for information, may I ask the Senator this question? The State of South Carolina was dry quite a long time before national prohibition had taken effect, was it not?

Mr. BLEASE. The State enacted a prohibition law, but never has gone dry.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I had reference to the enactment of a prohibition law.

Mr. BLEASE. Yes; we had what was known as the dispensary system. We had a State dispensary. Then we got rid of that and adopted what was called the county dispensary plan. Then we voted that out and enacted a prohibition law before national prohibition was ever adopted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Can the Senator tell us how long before national prohibition it was that the State prohibition law went into effect in his State? It was some years at least.

Mr. BLEASE. Four or five years.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is my recollection that the dispensary law went out about 1910.

Mr. BLEASE. The dispensary law went out and then we had the county dispensary plan for a while. My recollection is it was about 1915 or 1916.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Perhaps the Senator is correct about that. I do not remember having heard of any particular difficulty with enforcement of prohibition in any of the Southern States when they were dry as a consequence of State legislation. Can the Senator tell us with respect to his own State if the same difficulties were encountered prior to national prohibition that have been encountered since?

Mr. BLEASE. No, sir.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why not?

Mr. BLEASE. We have 14 circuit judges in my State. The county of Charleston constitutes one circuit by itself and has a judge and solicitor. In some of the other circuits we have two counties. That makes it possible for the 14 circuit judges to take care of the State indictments. But in the matter of the Federal indictments the two Federal judges have absolutely been unable to look after them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was not speaking about that, but I was particularly interested in learning about the difference in the conditions existing in the dry Southern States before national prohibition and after. The Senator was governor of his State for a while.

Mr. BLEASE. Yes. I had that honor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. During what period?

Mr. BLEASE. During the period of the county dispensaries, from 1911 to 1915.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Prior to national prohibition the situation had to be taken care of entirely by the State courts?

Mr. BLEASE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And since then it has been taken care of not only by the State courts but by the Federal courts as well?

Mr. BLEASE. To some extent, but one of our judges—in fact, I believe both of them—when he finds a man has been tried and convicted in a State court, will not try him in the Federal court, which is correct, and should prevail everywhere. Another reason, to be perfectly frank about it, is that our people seem to have more resentment against the Federal prohibition law than they had against a State prohibition law. They seem to think that the Nation has not anything to do with it, and that if South Carolina wanted prohibition it was her business; in other words, we believe in State rights. Some of our people vote for prohibition who do not practice it; there is no question about that; and I am free to say that some people down there encourage the violation of the prohibition law.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BLEASE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to point out to the Senator from South Carolina that the extra appropriation of $24,000,000 which has just passed the House of Representatives and may become a law will permit the employment of additional agents to enforce the prohibition law. So, while the Senator has his bill pending for another judge, had we not better make it two judges in order to take care of the eventualities when more agents get out into the field?

Mr. BLEASE. No. I think most of the blind tigers in my State will be able to do as they are now doing, paying "license" fees to the Federal, State, and county officers, and go on with their business.

Mr. President, as I have stated I am not objecting at all to any other State having additional judges. I made my objection the other day simply for the purpose of bringing my bill before the Senate. That bill is on the calendar immediately following the bill in which the Senator from New York is interested, and when it comes up I shall ask the Senate to pass it. That bill has been unanimously indorsed by the House committee and unanimously passed by the House and is asked for by the judges and others whom I have mentioned. As I have stated, it is not a personal fight of mine. These gentlemen are asking for this relief, and as their representative, of course, it is my duty to press it before Congress.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if he withdraws further objection to the bill under consideration?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina also withdraw his objection to the preceding judgeship bills?

Mr. BLEASE. I only objected, as I have said, for the purpose of bringing my case before the Senate. The South Carolina bill has been reported adversely, but when it shall be reached I shall move the rejection of the adverse report and the passage of the bill, and I hope that other Senators will be as kind to me as I am to them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. BRUCE. In the meantime I object until the Senator from South Carolina has a chance to dispose of his bill. I do not think that there is any more occasion for these other Federal judgeships that there is for one in South Carolina. I am prepared to vote for all of them.

Mr. WAGNER. The bill upon which the Senator from South Carolina addressed the Senate is now under consideration and has passed the stage of objection because the Senate by a vote decided to take it up for consideration.

Mr. BRUCE. I was not aware of that.

Mr. WAGNER. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he permit the disposition of the bill now under consideration before he makes his request.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am willing to do that. I did not want to stand in the way of the Senator's bill, because I realized the necessity for additional judges in New York.

Mr. WAGNER. There is an absolute necessity for them.

Mr. BLEASE. A parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to move the passage of all six bills?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At one time?

Mr. BLEASE. En bloc.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to say a word with respect to that request if I may do so, with the permission of the Senate. I trust that arrangement will not be made. I am not to be understood now as offering any objection at all to the bill in which the Senator from South Carolina is interested; but I trust the bills will not be considered en bloc. The Judiciary Committee has been forced to adopt a rule that they will not consider any more omnibus judge creating bills. That practice has developed into nothing less than a scandal. Judges have been assigned to various States by amendments to such omnibus bills in a perfectly unjustifiable manner. There was just simply a combination made to put a bill through; a Senator would object to another Senator's bill being passed unless he were given an additional judge for his State. So the Judiciary Committee has resolved not to report any more omnibus bills, but to take up each bill on its own merits. I trust the bills now on the calendar will be discussed in that spirit. Let us take up the bill of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and if it seems to have merit, let us pass it; if it does not, let us try to defeat it; and let us do the same when we come to the bill of the Senator from South Carolina. I am sure he will not ask any more than that.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will permit me, I call his attention to the fact that all of these bills have been to the Judiciary Committee, and my request would not bring about an omnibus bill, but would simply involve considering the bills upon which the committee has already acted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

Mr. BLEASE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am not very familiar with this bill; but with my present views I shall be constrained to vote against it. I want to suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that only two years ago we passed a bill creating more than 25 or 26 new judgeships——

Mr. BLEASE. Tweny-six were created, as I stated a while ago.

Mr. KING. In addition to that, we have passed a number of separate judicial bills since then. The showing then made I felt did not warrant the creation of the number of the judicial districts that were established by law or of the large number of judges for whom provision was made. It was shown that in a number of the courts there were many cases pending, but upon examination most of them were found to be motions or matters that could be disposed of very quickly, and many of them related to bankruptcy cases. So it seemed to me that there was no necessity for the creation of such a large number of additional judges. We gave, as I recall, the southern district of New York several new judges, and since then, I think, have added to the list of judges in the State of New York.

I think the Judiciary Committee would serve a very useful purpose if they would consider again the question of relieving the Federal courts of the petty police cases that are before them now.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that I heartily concur with him in that suggestion, and I have been advocating it for some time. I think it is almost an insult to a man holding the honorable position of United States judge to make a police court out of the court over which he presides.

Mr. KING. I offered a bill, may I say to the Senator, which was considered rather in a desultory and imperfect way by the Judiciary Committee, providing that commissioners might be designated by the courts to receive pleas in misdemeanor cases, to dispose of them upon pleas of guilty, and, if trials were demanded, that the jury which was available in the Federal court might be utilized in the trial of such cases, with right of appeal from the commissioner to the Federal court. In that way I felt sure that we could dispose of hundreds of these little cases which it is now claimed clog the calendars of the Federal courts.

I do not like to criticize the Federal judges, because I know the ability and the eminence of so many of them, if not all, but I have felt that the Federal judges did not work as hard as they might have done. For instance, it was shown to us that one judge in the State of Indiana was performing all of the work in that great State. He did not ask for any additional help, but we gave another judge to Indiana. If one judge could dispose of all of the work of the great State of Indiana, it seemed to me that we were rather prodigal in creating new districts and making provision for additional judges. I believe, Mr. President, that, with greater executive ability, many of the cases that are now pending could be quickly disposed of and the dockets would not be clogged as they are clogged at the present time. I have not heard sufficient reason to justify me in supporting this bill.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. WAGNER. I have the floor. I have not yet begun.

Mr. BRUCE. I did not know whether or not the Senator wanted to retain the floor.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, such a measure as the Senator from Utah suggests, if enacted, would afford great relief to the congested condition of the Federal court calendars in New York, but we are facing a reality. In the southern district of New York, for which we are seeking an increase of three judges, it takes now some two years to reach the trial of a case after it is at issue.

In order to give the Senator an idea of the conditions prevailing there, let me say that last year there were commenced 1,515 civil actions and during that year only 1,067 such actions were terminated; so that in that one year the civil calendar of the court, at that rate, is running 500 cases behind. That condition exists despite the fact that in addition to the six judges who were appointed for the southern district we constantly have judges from other jurisdictions coming in to relieve the pressure. The outside judges thus coming to New York encounter considerable difficulty, because, as Senators know, cases must be conducted according to the practice of the particular State in which the district is situated, and it takes a judge from another community a little time to become familiar with the procedural law of a particular State.

We are running constantly behind. It takes over two years to reach the ordinary civil suit for trial after the case is on the calendar, and, as time goes on, that interval will necessarily increase, so that before long it will be two years and a half and then three years. The distinguished Senator from Utah, an ex-judge, knows that such delay often results in a serious miscarriage of justice, because of the death of witnesses and for other reasons.

There is an additional necessity in New York growing out of the fact that it has become, as I think all will admit, the financial center and the commercial center of the world. The growth of New York in those directions has been out of all proportion to the increase in population, and with the increase in the importance of the city in the financial and commercial world there arise more disputes, which bring about more frequent litigation. The result is that in the southern and eastern districts of New York the courts must dispose of controversies of the greatest importance and significance to the whole United States. We are unable to cope with this problem if we are limited to the present judiciary. Many of these cases present justiciable questions which for the best interests of the country ought to be adjudicated and determined by a process of judicial deliberation. They are to-day settled by the litigants because they are unable to secure a trial. Indeed, I doubt whether even the bill now pending will be more than a palliative to relieve this very serious situation.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator, is there any objection to the bill?

Mr. WAGNER. I am sorry if the Senator from Ohio is not enjoying my address. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] made some objection; he said that he was not satisfied; that he had not sufficient facts, I take it, upon which to form an opinion as to whether or not he ought to support the measure. I am trying as best I can to inform him of the situation as it really exists.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has convinced me, and I thought that would be sufficient to convince the Senator from Utah.

Mr. WAGNER. The moment the Senator from Utah suggests that he has been convinced I will stop. I have no desire to impose myself upon the Senate and less desire to hear myself speak.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator if he thinks it is possible to obtain competent material for the salaries paid United States judges. As I understand, the judges in the State courts of New York receive nearly twice as much as the Federal judges receive.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes. I was a recipient of that salary for some time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Another thing is: It depends a good deal on the kind of people you get on the bench, it seems to me, whether it is advisable to add these judges or not. Has the Senator any idea that the Senators from the great State of New York will have any voice in the selection of these judges?

Mr. WAGNER. No; if I may answer the Senator, I am not deceiving myself on that question. I do not expect to be consulted and I am not interested in that question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think very likely neither of the Senators will be consulted.

Mr. WAGNER. I think the Senator is making quite a safe prediction, but I am not interested in the question of patronage; I am interested in the public welfare and the administration of justice. Let me say for the judges of that district: The salary is a small one for a judge to receive, but we have many distinguished lawyers in our section who are willing to make that sacrifice for the opportunity to render this great public service. While most of the judges who are now sitting are of different political faith than I am, yet I will say for them that they are all of the highest character and scholarship; and I will also say for them that they are working up to the peak of their physical endurance in combating this congestion of the calendar.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does not the Senator think that the Senators from the State might well be called into council with the Attorney General before the selection of these judges? There may even be a choice among Republicans.

Mr. WAGNER. I hope I shall be consulted. I am sure I can make very valuable suggestions to the President in the matter.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am afraid that the practice is the contrary. I warn the Senator that very likely neither one of the Senators will be consulted.

Mr. WAGNER. I am not deceiving myself.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, as I understand it, for some years before his death the person who was principally consulted with reference to judicial appointments and appointments of United States district attorneys and marshals, was Wayne B. Wheeler, the general counsel of the Anti-Saloon League.

I have no objection to this tremendous increase in the number of Federal judges that is going on. As I have so often said, as long as we have the prohibition statute on the statute books it must in all decency be enforced. The Senate has already made an additional appropriation of $24,000,000 for prohibition enforcement—a very considerable sum of money, but a small sum of money when contrasted with the $300,000,000 that Mr. Doran said was necessary if prohibition is to be enforced.

What I am desirous to have understood by the country is that this great increase in the number of Federal judges is largely due to the vain and impotent efforts that have been made heretofore to enforce prohibition. In other words, this great increase in the number of the Federal judges is one of the penalties that the people of the United States are paying for that asinine, imbecile law known as the Volstead law. Why, this is but the beginning of the inflowing tide of demands for new Federal judgeships.

The Senator from New York, I believe, is asking for three now.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Five.

Mr. BRUCE. He is asking for five, I understand.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. We are asking for three in the southern district.

Mr. BRUCE. And the Senator is aware that Mr. Buckner, one of the very ablest and most experienced United States district attorneys in the country, testified under oath before a subcommittee of the Senate that no less than 85 Federal courts are necessary to enforce prohibition in the southern district of New York, and no less than 150 to enforce it in the whole State of New York. So we have reason to believe that in a short time after these three additional judgeships shall have been created the Senate and the House will be asked to create 65 more for the southern district of New York State, to say nothing of the rest of that State.

That is the point. So far as I am concerned, you can have your courts; you can continue your ineffectual, impotent efforts to enforce the prohibition law. Sooner or later, however, enforcement will break down, and I am willing to bide my time, as are all the rest of us who are hostile to the Volstead law; but if the real intent behind the creation of these three new Federal judgeships is to strengthen the arm of prohibition enforcement, why does not the Senator from New York come forward at once and, instead of asking for 3 Federal judgeships, ask for 65 more?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. The difficulty in New York is not with the prohibition law. They seem to be able to dispose of those cases with fair regularity; but there is very important civil litigation there.

Mr. BRUCE. I know that New York is a great, growing city, and, of course, a certain addition has to be made to the number of judgeships from time to time, anyhow. That is all perfectly normal. That, however, is not the occasion for the present application. The occasion for it is the need that Mr. Buckner specified in his testimony before the Senate subcommittee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course the Senator from New York does not claim that there are any violations of the Volstead law in the southern district of New York?

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, no; of course not. That is a sort of terrestrial paradise so far as sobriety is concerned, of course; and I am bound to admit, as I have previously said, that the civilization of the city of New York as respects drink, as well as in every other respect, is distinctly superior to that of many other sections of the United States, whether those sections be in the Middle West or the extreme West or the South.

If we are going to have this increase in Federal judges, I trust that the Senator from South Carolina will tack on his application for another Federal judgeship in South Carolina to the application of the Senator from New York for his three additional judgeships. Let us have enforcement all along the line. Let us have all the additional Federal judgeships everywhere that are necessary for enforcement.

Things are coming to a crisis. They are gradually working up to a climax. The people of the United States are being placed in a better and better position to appraise the cost, not only in the loss of civil liberty but in mere pecuniary terms, inflicted upon them by prohibition.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair). The Senator from South Carolina offers an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. BLEASE. This will not delay the bill a minute. The House has already passed it unanimously.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add, as an additional section, the following:

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one additional district judge for the United States District Court for the Eastern and Western Districts of South Carolina, who shall, at the time of his appointment, be a resident and a citizen of the State of South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I feel impelled to say a word with respect to the bill now tendered as an amendment to that under consideration, because I was a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary to which these matters were referred, and I do not see any other member of the subcommittee on the floor.

I simply want to advert to the belief entertained by the Senator from South Carolina that his State has been discriminated against by the action of the committee.

I have before me here the record, which shows, for instance, that the State of Arkansas, which has a little larger population than the State of South Carolina, has but two judges; that the State of Colorado has only one judge; that the State of Florida has three judges; that the State of Idaho has but one judge; that the State of Iowa has but two judges; that the State of Kentucky has but two judges; that the State of Louisiana has but two judges; that the State of Maine has but two judges; that the State of Maryland has but one judge.

Mr. BRUCE. We have two.

Mr. KING. We created one recently.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was reading the figures of 1926.

Mr. BRUCE. We have two now; and, if the Senator will allow me, the necessity for the new judgeship was created almost entirely by the congestion produced by prohibition in our Federal court.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no doubt that that was a contributing consideration.

I observe that the State of Massachusetts, with a population considerably more than double the population of the State of South Carolina, has only three judges; that the State of Minnesota, with a very much larger population, has only two judges; that the State of Mississippi has only two judges; that the State of Nebraska has only two judges; the State of Nevada, one; the State of New Hampshire, one. The State of North Carolina has, indeed, three, but it has a population of something like a million more than the State of South Carolina. The State of North Dakota has but two; the State of Oregon has but two; the State of South Dakota, one; the State of Utah, one; the State of West Virginia has but two; and the great State of Wisconsin has but two.

So, however imperative the necessity for another judge in the State of South Carolina may be, I do not think any contention can be made that the State has been discriminated against in the matter of judges.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. BRUCE. May I remind the Senator, however, that the criterion is not the total amount of the population of a State, generally speaking, but the amount of the drinking population in the State. I will say that South Carolina, so far as its bibulous propensities are concerned, will more than contrast favorably with all those other States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That may be.

Mr. BRUCE. For instance, the writer to whom I referred a few days ago, Mr. Lawson Purdy, of the city of New York, had this to say in an article written by him in relation to arrests for drunkenness, which was published in the New York Times:

South Carolina comes next, with seven cities. The average for the seven is 208 arrests per 10,000, as against 20 arrests per 10,000 in the city of New York.

So the Senator will see that where you have a great deal of drunkenness you unquestionably have a great many distilleries, stills, still worms, and fermenters, obnoxious to the Volstead Act.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Bootlegging and rum running.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; bootlegging and rum running, and what not; so what the Senator from Montana fails to make allowance for is the extreme necessities of the State of South Carolina, created by the fact that the number of arrests for drunkenness, and, I must infer at the moment, the number of arrests for violations of the Volstead law, is in that State far in excess, per 10,000 of population, of the arrests for drunkenness and violations of the Volstead law in some other communities.

Consequently, of course, the same number of judges are not requisite for those other communities that are requisite for South Carolina. I do not want to bear too hard on my dear native South; I could go on without the slightest difficulty and show that a contrast instituted as respects arrests for drunkenness between many of the western communities and the city of New York would be quite as unfavorable to the western communities.

For instance, my attention was called to the fact a short time ago that in proportion to population the little town of Pocatello, in the State of Idaho, represented in part on this floor by our friend the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has a thirst ten times as great as the thirst of the population of the city of New York. The same thing is doubtless as true, or nearly as true, of the capital city of the State of Idaho, Boise City.

I say that the Senator from South Carolina, therefore, is clearly entitled to his additional Federal judge. The want of his State is acute. It is distressing. I think it is even more appealing than the want of many other communities in the United States, though, of course, we have the authority of Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews for the statement that there is nothing local, nothing regional, nothing sectional, about bootlegging, but that it is coextensive with the entire territory of the United States.

Before I take my seat let me say that I forgot a few moments ago to run out the question put by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] to its consequences. The Senator from Florida very naturally asked the Senator from New York whether he would have anything to do with the employment of the additional Federal judges that the Senator from New York is seeking. Of course, he would have nothing to do with it. The same thing would be true perhaps of additional judgeships for any State in the Union.

The influence of the Anti-Saloon League heretofore in the appointment of judges has not been exclusive; other cooperating influences, of course, have come into play when judicial appointments have been made, and the same thing is true of United States district attorneys and marshals; but every man who is familiar with the history of this Government for a considerable period in the past knows that years before the death of Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler, the general counsel of the Anti-Saloon League, few judicial appointments, few appointments of United States district attorneys, and few appointments of Federal marshals were made by the President of the United States except after being practically visaed by Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator will recall to mind that in the recent past it has been stated that one of the prime qualifications for the Attorney General in the new President's Cabinet will be his attitude toward the prohibition question. I assume it follows that if that requirement is true as to the Attorney General it will be necessary for every prospective candidate for a judgeship to be interrogated as to his attitude and personal habits under the Volstead law.

Mr. BRUCE. And they have been inquired into by the Anti-Saloon League, I believe, with a view to influencing appointments.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I did not know they had gone as far as that.

Mr. BRUCE. They have been, I believe.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does not the Senator think they should be?

Mr. BRUCE. I do not know the conditions under which the league inquires into them.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator does not think that they ought to inquire into the bent of a man's mind and his inclination regarding this subject, his disposition to prosecute people who violate the eighteenth amendment? He does not think we ought to inquire into that?

Mr. BRUCE. I have no objection to anybody being consulted in connection with a judicial appointment or the appointment of United States district attorneys or marshals, but I object to such a fanatical, unscrupulous, tyrannical agency as the Anti-Saloon League exerting a determining influence in the making of judicial appointments or the appointment of any Federal marshal or the appointment of any Federal officer of any sort who has anything to do with the enforcement of prohibition.

Mr. President, a vote will now be taken on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, will it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, while I sympathize with the Senator from South Carolina, I rather agree with the statement of the distinguished Senator from Montana that in these questions of increasing the number of judges we ought to consider every case on its merits, and that can only be done by considering each judicial district. I hope the Senator will therefore withdraw his amendment, so that we can now dispose of the bill for the southern district of New York, having considered the necessity for an increase in the number of judges there, and then we may very well take up the case in which the Senator from South Carolina is interested, that of his own State.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, that would work such gross injustice that I would feel that I could not give adequate expression to my sense of the injustice before 2 o'clock.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, I was interested when the Senator from Montana was reading the article as to the number of judges assigned to the different States in that, inadvertently, of course, he omitted to state that the State of Vermont has but one Federal judge. I want to state, without the slightest reflection on any of the other judges, that the State of Vermont needs but one judge, if he has the ability and the efficiency of Judge Harland B. Howe. He can take care of all the work in the State of Vermont and spend considerable time helping out in New York City, to which he is assigned term after term.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, is it candid for the Senator from Vermont not to make any mention of the fact that a citizen of Vermont can without the slightest difficulty slip over the boundary line between the United States and Canada and secure what he desires to drink?

Mr. DALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BRUCE. Of course, there is not the same need for stills and for bootlegging apparatus of any sort in Vermont, because of its fortunate or unfortunate proximity to a great enlightened community that has passed out of the barbarous stage of development to which prohibition belongs.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, no doubt the Senator from Maryland is correct when he states that there is great opportunity for violation of the eighteenth amendment in the State of Vermont. There is no doubt about that. We have a great many cases there. But Judge Howe is so free from any influence of any organization or any person that that law is executed in the State of Vermont under his jurisdiction so well that I doubt if there is a parallel to it in any other State in the Union.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course, because the people of Vermont, in that happy geographical situation, can gratify their moral instincts, and their physical instincts at the same time. In other words, they can enforce prohibition within the limits of the State of Vermont, and yet concurrently without difficulty obtain from the Canadian territory all the supplies of whisky, wine, or beer that they may desire.

Mr. DALE. I do not know that I understand the Senator. Does the Senator from Maryland mean that the citizens of Vermont are lawbreakers?

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, no. I believe that their general morals compare favorably with those of the people of any community in the United States. I have the greatest respect for the New England character, as anyone who knows me knows, but I do say that, to say the least, the people of Vermont are susceptible to the ordinary infirmities of human nature, if such they can be called, including a desire at times to take a wee drop, like the rest of the people of the United States, and they are so situated that they can without difficulty gratify their desire because of their being so near Canada.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, Vermont had a prohibitory law for about half a century and the people of Vermont, under that law, became generally so influenced by it that they have become educated and developed to the extent that they do not need so much liquor.

Mr. BRUCE. That does not correspond with the newspaper accounts that I have read from time to time. I think Vermont is a good illustration of the truth of what our celebrated Johns Hopkins professor, Raymond Pearl, who, by the way, was a native of New Hampshire, said a short time ago. He said, "It is useless to keep up this agitation against prohibition. The people of the United States have made up their minds to have both prohibition and liquor." Sometimes I think he was about right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I shall have to ask for a quorum if the vote is to be taken now, and I would want a roll call. That may take until after 2 o'clock. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. DENEEN] on account of illness.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

I wish also to announce that the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is detained from the Senate by illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYDINGS in the chair) Seventy-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, House bill 11526.

Mr. REED of Missouri obtained the floor.

TRAVEL PAY FOR SPANISH-AMERICAN SOLDIERS

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which was objected to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] when it was reached on the calendar. The Senator now withdraws his objection.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If it does not lead to any discussion, I shall not object.

Mr. BROOKHART. The bill is No. 1367 on the calendar. The Senator from Utah has investigated it and withdraws his objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRUCE. I object until I know how the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs feels about the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

(The message follows the matter under this heading.)

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, the bill has been explained to me and I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 1513. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1513) granting travel pay and other allowances to certain soldiers of the Spanish-American War and the Philippine insurrection who were discharged in the Philippines. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons who enlisted in the Regular Army of the United States in the year 1898 under special act of Congress for the duration of the war with Spain, who were honorably discharged from such enlistment while serving in the Philippines, who did not there reenter the military service of the United States through commission or enlistment, who embarked at Manila within one year after such discharge for return to the United States, shall, upon application to the War Department under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, be allowed and paid their actual necessary expenses, if any, for lodging and subsistence in the Philippines for the period, not exceeding three months, during which they, respectively, awaited transportation by Government transport, and, in addition, for the distance from Manila, P. I., to San Francisco, Calif., the travel pay and commutation of subsistence formerly allowed under section 1290, Revised Statutes of the United States, to soldiers of the Regular Army honorably discharged on expiration of enlistment, less any sum or sums of money actually paid by the Government to such persons, respectively, at time of such discharge or subsequent thereto by way of travel pay or allowances for transportation and subsistence between said places.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums of money as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11859) for the relief of B. C. Miller.

The message informed the Senate that the request of the Senate for the return of the bill (S. 4222) to authorize the creation of Indian trust estates, and for other purposes, was respectfully declined by the House of Representatives.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business, House bill 11526, is before the Senate, and the Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I hesitate to take the time of the Senate to discuss a bill that has already been so thoroughly debated. However, some views have been expressed which I think call for a reply.

There are at work in this country forces which, to me, seem inimical to the public welfare and the safety of the Nation.

Diogenes lived a good deal in dreamland as well as in a tub. Walking one day with his eyes fixed on the skies, he fell into a ditch—where dreamers generally land. A practical, hard-headed, sensible old lady said to him, "Mr. Philosopher, when your feet are on the ground your head should not be in the skies."

The business of government is intensely practical. The great body of American people are busy in their homes, in their workshops, in their fields. They send to Washington men to represent them. These representatives ought to be watchmen upon the tower. Their vision, so far as human limitations permit, should encompass the conditions of the world. The American people have the right to believe that their Representatives are keenly alive to international situations, that they take no chances that can, by prudence, be avoided, that they consider only the welfare of their country, placing its aspirations and destiny above those of all other nations and peoples; never for a moment losing sight of the fact that by preserving this Republic they will perform the greatest possible service to mankind the world over—for the star of America has guided all races of men from the night of tyranny into the dawn of the day of universal liberty.

Government, I repeat, is practical. We do not sojourn in a land of dreams. We live amongst men and amongst nations—nations that vary in the degrees of their civilization from cannibalism to philosophy; races of men who are dominant, forceful, ambitious, restless, determined to gain and keep advantage.

I desire in no manner to reflect upon any nation. I am largely in accord with the eloquent statement of the distinguished Senator from Maryland, made a day or two since, in which he spoke so highly of the British people. In consonance with that I can pay the same meed of respect and admiration for the great German people, the Scandinavian countries, to Holland, and to France—indeed, to all those countries which have established civilizations, cultivated the arts, and forwarded the march of progress. But, sir, we must remember that all races have their own particular ambitions and their own special interests. Their hearts beat true to those interests. Their souls are not consumed with yearnings for the interests of the United States.

The application of a little common sense to the affairs of life would dissipate some of the mists and clouds in which the pacifists are lost. In our own land neighbors contend with neighbors; cities with cities; business rivals crush business rivals; great corporations destroy smaller corporations; powerful individuals break down the trade, the commerce, and the business of smaller individuals. And we know that, in the end, the ability to defend himself is the best security any man living upon this earth can have. The defenseless are always the victims.

Considering the case of nations, you must accentuate the rule, because the elements of personal sympathy and compassion are absent. There are no particular ties to bind other nations to us or us to other nations. Governments of other nations must consider their own people and their own interests. If our commerce expands, it is largely at their expense. If our Nation grows rich, it is, in part, to their disadvantage. Besides, there is a background which is not to be disregarded. I refer to prejudices, deep-rooted in the centuries, to economic conditions which frequently force governments to act even to the point of making war.

Accordingly, when we consider the question of the American Navy we must regard the problem not as of dreamland, but as one of this earth as this earth is. We must, therefore, not estimates the governors of the nations as angels recruited from the skies, anointed with the oil of holiness, and exuding the sweet perfumes of paradise. We must view these governors as practical men, often relentless in their ambitions and ruthless in their revenges.

The first duty of the Senate is to protect America, to make certain that America is safe. We should, therefore, close our ears to the whimperings and whinings of those who have too often led us into mistakes and blunders. To my mind, the lowest form of animal life is the man who thinks more of other countries than he does of his own country. I despise internationalism and internationalists.

Mr. President, what is the cry raised in opposition to this bill? It is that a new dispensation has come upon this earth; that the hearts of men have changed; that no longer are there such passions left as greed, avarice, hatred, ambition, or selfishness. Gentlemen here have assumed to speak for the world, to express "the world's opinion." Self-appointed and self-annointed, they declare themselves to be "the voice of the world." They know the inner consciousness of all races. They speak with authority for the universe.

Sir, I confess myself utterly lacking in those divine attributes. I only beg to suggest that the best way to ascertain national policies is to observe national acts. We should find out not only what is being said in diplomatic propaganda, but also what is being done in the armories of the nations. Therefore, I invite attention to a few plain facts which ought to be considered and even comprehended by gentlemen who profess to have surveyed the world and to know just what "the world is thinking," and to have discovered that every heart is now kindly and that the spirit of Christ hovers over the land and the sea.

Mr. President, the so-called "general opinion of mankind," of which we have heard so much, can not be ascertained by the dreams of dreamers, by the shouts of enthusiasts, by the propaganda of pacifists, or by the treason of internationalists who subordinate the interests of their native land to those of foreign states.

I repeat, the opinion of the nations must be determined by the policies they persistently follow:

In Great Britain that opinion is manifest in a standing army of 404,000 men; in a navy of more than 700 great fighting ships; in fortresses that line the shores of the world and dot the seas; in guns that command every lane of the oceans; in the present construction of vast fortresses; in the present building of 78 great vessels of war.

The opinion of France is expressed in a standing army of 727,000 men; in a reserve army of 4,610,000 men; in preparations to dominate the air; in the creation of deadly submarines—the assassins of the sea.

The opinion of Russia is demonstrated in a standing army of 658,000 men and in a reserve army of 5,425,000 men.

The opinion of Italy is registered in a standing army of 380,000 men and a reserve army of 2,990,000 men.

The opinion of Poland, recently born, child of the new millennium, is recorded in a standing army of 242,000 men and in a reserve army of 2,000,000 men.

The opinion of Yugoslavia, likewise child of the new day, is shown in its standing army of 142,000 men and its reserves of more than 2,000,000 men.

The opinion of Czechoslovakia, another millennium product, appears in its standing army of 140,700 and in its reserves of 1,489,000.

The opinion and purpose of Japan is proclaimed by its standing army of 210,000 men and its reserves of 2,038,000 men. That opinion and purpose is brought down to date by the 16 cruisers and 33 submarines now in process of construction.

Would you hear "the voice of the world," oh, you dreamers of dreams? Listen and your ears will be greeted by the roar of vast furnaces forming the steel armor of dreadnoughts—by the chorus of mighty hammers shaping the keels of great battleships—by the hum of countless lathes fashioning rifles and machine guns—by the whir of the propellers of innumerable airplanes. Look and your eyes will behold the skilled engineers of every nation planning and directing the construction of invincible armaments. They are calculating the distance of every shot, the elevation of every gun. Millions of men, at the command of skilled officers, are marching and countermarching in every evolution of defense and attack. Unlock the secret cabinets of the war councils of the world and you will there find ready plans for the sinking of the American fleet, the bombardment of American cities; the maps of the roads over which invading hosts may some day march across our soil. Remember, as you look, that back of these governmental agencies are peoples who uncomplainingly pay taxes and with unquestioned loyalty yield obedience.

In the face of these obvious conditions the imbecilic cry of safety is raised. We are told to put our faith in paper treaties. But remember when war comes paper treaties are but scraps blown about by the winds of passion. Remember paper treaties will not arrest the force of explosive shells, will not hold back invading armies, will not save our navies upon the seas, or protect our forces upon the lands. Even the naked valor of our valorous men may not be sufficient to rescue us. The pages of history are red with heroic blood shed by men bearing inferior arms. But even if the heroism of our sailors and soldiers might triumph over superior arms, what shall I say of the man who is willing to send the sons of America half armed to death when if properly equipped they could win the victory with small loss of life.

If war shall come it will boot us little, as we behold our unbalanced and inefficient fleet sent to the bottom, to say that we were misled by great speeches of pacifist Senators who assured us "that war would never come." As our warships engage the enemy, as our lads throw overboard the lifeboats knowing that if their vessel is sunk by superior guns they must all go to watery graves, small solace will it be to them that pacifists passed resolutions that there should never be any more wars. Small solace will it be to those who stand upon the headlands and watch the conflict, to know that these half-armed vessels fought bravely, that our men died like heroes and that our fleet went down with flags flying and bands playing "America."

Such, sir, is the proposition confronting us. It is one of practical common sense. We are not given the choice as to whether or not we want to live in a world enjoying heavenly peace. Such a world does not presently exist. We are living on this cold, hard earth as it is. Men have not been saints in the past and will not be transformed into saints by the resolutions of committees or the treaties of diplomats.

The man who would lull us to sleep in time of danger, the man who teaches that there should be no love of country, the man who declares that the citizen should not be taught to fight and die for his country's rights is unworthy to live under the American flag.

Mr. President, we ought to have learned something from the experiences of the past. The history of the wars of the centuries is before us. No lesson is more profound or inescapable than that there must be preparation or there will come defeat. War to-day is not a mere matching of personal valor. War is largely a matter of machinery. A single squad of men with a machine gun fortunately situated may mow down a regiment of the bravest soldiers who ever went to battle. A cannon that can shoot 2 or 3 miles farther than its antagonist can destroy that antagonist. The bravery of the gunner can not make up for the lack of range. The finest captain who ever commanded a vessel of war is absolutely helpless if engaged by a vessel of superior speed armed with guns of a superior range, for the latter can lie out of range and sink the inferior vessel without even the chance of an effective return shot.

It requires months and years to create effective machinery. The nation that does not possess that machinery will, in every contest, go down to defeat unless, because of the possession of superior man power, it is able to hold the field, notwithstanding the disadvantage. In that case, however, it must heap its dead in windrows, saturate its soil with blood needlessly shed, and endure the pangs and tortures of months and years while creating the armament which should have been prepared in advance.

Mr. President, valor half armed can never resist valor fully armed. History is replete—replete to nauseation—with examples.

The massed armies of the world broke upon the phalanxes of Alexander.

In the First Punic War the legions of Rome were scattered by the elephants of Hannibal.

The warriors of Gaul and Germany fell before the swords of Rome's trained legions.

The Saxons were ridden down by the mailed cavalry of William the Conqueror.

At Agincourt the knighthood of France was destroyed by the longbows of English yeomen.

Napoleon's dream of world empire vanished when the superior fleet of Nelson destroyed the French ships at Trafalgar.

The dominance of Spain ended and her decay and fall began when Drake's cannon sank the Armada.

Holland's vision of commercial supremacy was ended when the British fleet destroyed the Dutch men-of-war.

Napoleon declared, "God fights with the strongest artillery," and proved his thesis as he swept to destruction the allied forces of Europe. What a pity it was that he did not have the advice of the Senator from Iowa! He might have saved a lot of cannon.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, upon that proposition I recollect that Napoleon died a prisoner on the island of St. Helena.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes; Napoleon died at St. Helena, but not until he had for nearly 20 years held the united hosts of Europe at bay and overrun country after country. He was never crushed until those armies finally, after infinite losses, had reached a point of preparation equal to his, and then, with the world surrounding him, now at last prepared, Napoleon surrendered.

Had Napoleon possessed a fleet superior to that of Great Britain there never would have been a Waterloo, and the tricolors of France would have floated over the entire Continent of Europe.

The ridiculous statement has been made that in the World War the British Navy was useless. All intelligent persons except the Senator from Iowa know that the British fleet bottled up the German fleet and held it bottled up.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, it was the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] who made that remark.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Oh, the Senator has forgotten.

Mr. BROOKHART. I just read the RECORD.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I will let the Senator correct anything that needs correction. If I have misstated it, I will restate it for him; but I have a pretty distinct recollection of what was said yesterday.

Likewise the equally absurd statement is made that the English fleet suffered a terrible defeat at Jutland and fled from the scene of action. All will concede the gallantry of the German Navy. But the fact remains that the British fleet held its position and the smaller German fleet returned to its base. All will concede that had the German fleet been greatly superior in guns and metal to the British fleet it probably would have sent that fleet to the bottom before we ever entered the war, and Germany would then have swept British commerce from the seas, and probably have ended the conflict before April 6, 1917. Had the German fleet sunk the British fleet and been upon the ocean when we entered the war, there is every human probability that we never could have landed a single regiment of soldiers upon European soil. Our transports would have been destroyed, and hundreds of thousands of Americans, utterly defenseless, would have found their graves beneath the Atlantic's waves.

The Iowa admiral, Senator BROOKHART, tells us that cruisers are of no value in war; but a single German cruiser, the Emden, from August 11 to November 10, 1914, terrorized the ocean, seized ship after ship, alarmed coast cities, and continued her raids until she was sunk by a superior ship, the Australian cruiser Sydney. If the Sydney had not caught her the Emden would have continued to collect her toll until some other vessel superior in speed and guns could overtake her. A half dozen cruisers at large upon the sea could have destroyed almost the last vestige of British shipping.

The pacifist military experts of the Senate tell us that airplanes can destroy a ship as soon as it is within 200 miles of the shore line. Leaving out of account the doubt as to whether the airplane is really an effective instrument against battleships; leaving out of account night attacks and bombardment of cities; leaving out of account visibility; leaving out of account the fact that airplanes from the shore may be met and destroyed by airplanes launched from the decks of war vessels; leaving out of account improved antiaircraft artillery; disregarding all of these and many other factors, it still remains true that beyond the fanciful limit of 200 miles stretches the vast expanse of the mighty ocean, whose waters must be traveled by ocean craft, all of which would still be at the mercy of war vessels sailing the high seas.

I venture to remind Senators that battles upon the ocean are not always fought within sight of land or at an accommodating distance for airplanes. The nation which is safe only within 200 miles of its shores is already surrounded, pent up, cut off from the world. It can not even wage a defensive war, because defense must always in the end be transformed into attack.

Imagine the humiliation of America if great sea powers were patrolling the ocean 200 miles from our coast and daring us to adventure outside! Such a condition, maintained for any considerable time, would mean defeat, disgrace, and perhaps the annihilation of the Republic.

The military and naval experts of Japan, of Great Britain, of France, of Italy, of Russia, of all maritime countries of the earth, including America, unite in the declaration that cruisers are a necessary part of any great navy. Against them we have the opinion of a remarkable multiple personality, namely, Rear Admiral BROOKHART, Major General BROOKHART, Chief of Staff BROOKHART, Chief of the Air Service BROOKHART, "General Opinion of Mankind" BROOKHART, "General Voice of the World" BROOKHART, "Custodian of Farmers and Laborers" BROOKHART, "Keeper of the Universal Conscience" BROOKHART, "Warden of the Wisdom of the Past and Prophet of the State of the Future" BROOKHART.

Outside the Senator there are some others.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator did not, I believe, say "Mussolini BROOKHART."

Mr. REED of Missouri. No. I love the Senator, and I am doing him all the justice I can, and so dealing with him as gently as possible. I mean by what I have said to mildly intimate that the argument made by the Senator yesterday is in the teeth of the opinions of the great military experts of the world, and that he sets up his own judgment against all of them when he tells us what all mankind is thinking. He has a right to do that. It is always the right of any man to have his opinion and to assert it as the judgment of all the world. [Laughter.]

Outside the Senate there are some others—the doctrinaires of the Third Internationale, who teach that national spirit should be suppressed and national patriotism forgotten. Likewise, there are pacifists who believe that our best defense is in defenselessness and that safety is found in weakness.

I have listened more than once to that siren song. We heard it before 1914. There were some college professors, anemic—I had almost said white-livered men—who were going over the country declaring that war would never come again. They carried on a crusade and solemnly announced the advent of the millennium. We were negotiating arbitration treaties with all the countries of the world. They were to end all war. We forgot that nations had been writing treaties of eternal peace since they first learned how to put pen to parchment.

Sir, the story of the world is a tale of treaties made and broken. Every civilized nation at every point of history has had treaties of amity with the other civilized nations. Yet the pacifists and conscientious objectors imagined that because Mr. Bryan and some others had negotiated certain treaties providing for arbitration that that was the end of war. Accordingly they went about singing that admirable ditty, I Didn't Raise My Boy to Be a Soldier.

Of course, no woman ever raised her boy to be a soldier, but American mothers do not raise their boys to be poltroons and cowards. They do not raise them so that they will stand by and see their mothers abused. They do not raise them to play the poltroon when home and country are assailed by foreign foes.

Suddenly there came out of the dark a shot that shook the world; and still pacifists proclaimed there was no danger; that no hand should be lifted, that we should make no preparation. We saw our ships sunk upon the sea, we saw the Lusitania go down with her precious freightage. Time and time and time again we saw Great Britain seize our ships. We saw her sow the North Sea with mines. We submitted to her orders that our ships traverse certain lanes or her mines would send them to the bottom. We beheld our vessels and cargoes taken before the English prize courts and there condemned without justice and without international law.

Then, at last, a condition arose so terrible that we had to act. What, then, was the situation? We had been told that if we got into war, if there was any insult to our country, a million men would leap to arms over night. But we found we could not provide arms for our men when they had leapt to arms.

We had been told that the valor of our men would be sufficient. But when we took the lads from their homes and ordered them go into camps there were no camps. We mobilized them without proper clothing, without proper shoes, without adequate equipment of any kind. We drilled them with broomsticks during the precious days and weeks and months when they ought to have been learning to handle rifles. We finally put into their hands old, obsolete weapons. We sent many thousands of them across the sea half equipped. On more than one occasion they were required to change arms in the face of the enemy and to immediately fight without opportunity to become familiar with the new and strange weapons.

We ordered them into battle without proper artillery support and protection. My recollection is that at the end of the war, when the armistice was signed, there were only 184 American-made field guns on the battle line. The rest of our fighting, so far as field guns were concerned, was done with cannon Pershing borrowed from England and France.

Our lads fought under a rain of fire of shell and gas from the skies without protection of airplanes of our own. Do you know that not a single American-made fighting airplane ever crossed a German trench during the war? We were experimenting. We were fooling around with a motor that has since been discarded as useless. We were spending a billion dollars for airplanes that could not fight or fly. Our soldiers had only such protection as could be given them by English and French flyers, and by our own men fighting in borrowed planes.

What wonder General Pershing cabled in substance that if the equipment he had demanded did not soon come the American Army would cease to be a fighting force. I can produce the telegram if anybody wants to see it.

These lads, forced from their homes, their hearts filled with patriotism, stood there in the trenches, or outside the trenches, exposed to fire from the sky without adequate airplane protection. There sleep beneath the poppies of France or here in their own beloved soil tens of thousands of men whose blood ought to be visited upon the heads of those who would not permit this country to be ready to defend itself.

Mr. President, George Washington may, in the opinion of pacifists, have been and old fool, but his sword carved out of the rock of fate the greatest Nation the world has ever seen. And George Washington said that the best way to prevent war is to be prepared for war.

I remarked a moment ago that this is not the first time I have heard these pacifistic arguments. I heard them before 1914, and I heard them also in 1922. We were to have a naval disarmament conference. We were going to stop building ships. We were told in song and story and sentimental ballad about "Hands Across the Sea." Oh, how they loved us—England and France and Japan. They came here. Their eyes misty with the tears of gratitude for the great service we had done. Their arms were extended to us in brotherly love. We were just going to sit at the table and amicably and unanimously agree to stop making instruments of destruction. But the foreign diplomats brought their military experts with them. Then we sat down at the table only to learn too late that the military experts and the foreign diplomats had gone around our representatives like a skilled cooper around a barrel, and before our representatives knew it they were headed in without even a spigot to breathe through. [Laughter.]

How stood the case? We had laid the keels, and to a large extent had built fighting craft that would have made us the master of the seas. Foreign countries knew they were in no danger from that mastery, but they wanted us to be in such condition that they might be the masters. So we agreed to destroy $600,000,000 worth of the finest fighting craft ever conceived in the brains of engineers. They destroyed just a few. They sunk some old, obsolete ships.

Then we came to examine the treaty which put no limitation upon cruisers. We soon found out that it deprived us of the right to fortify our own possessions; that we could not send a ship from America to the Philippine Islands and fight a battle because of the distance, the intermediate points not being fortified. We found out that Japan could take the unfortified Philippine Islands in 48 hours, and that if we went there with our ships we could not refuel and could not get our fleet back home.

We learned that Great Britain had drawn the line within which fortifications could not be erected, so curved as to exclude her contemplated fortifications of the East.

It finally dawned on our dull minds that these nations who pretended they wanted to stop armaments, to stop building navies, who professed to love us—just love us to death—who talked of hands across the sea and arms around the neck and kisses to the lips, were building cruisers all the time.

To equal the cruisers they have built and are building we must now spend $750,000,000.

There was an old farmer down in the State of New York who was observed one day in his country town with a mysterious-looking square package under his arm. One of the village wags said to him, "Uncle Ed, where have you been?" He said, "Down to New York." His friend said, "I hope you didn't buy another gold brick, Uncle Ed." He replied, "Well, yes, I did; but I told the fellow I bought it from that if it didn't turn out better than the one I bought from him before I never would patronize him any more."

How many times must we learn a lesson? What kind of intellect is it that can say "There will nevermore be war; there is to be eternal peace; we do not need any arms; we can rely on the doctrine of brotherly love," and at the same time can see that every great nation in the world is building warships, forging cannon, massing soldiers, preparing for some eventuality which we all hope will never occur, but which we all know may come like a thief in the night?

Tell me why the Bermuda Islands are fortified. Tell me why England clings to a range of islands that absolutely command the Panama Canal. Tell me why she rejected with scorn the suggestion that America might want to acquire those islands. From the island of Jamaica in five and one-half hours' time she can destroy with her airplanes the Panama Canal. If our fleet were divided, part of it in the Atlantic and part of it in the Pacific, and it were necessary to concentrate the fleet, she could close the canal.

Tell me why she has her fortress near the southern end of South America, save that she can from that point attack ships going around the Horn. Tell me why she has her fortresses upon her eastern coast frowning down upon waters that wash the shores of the United States. Tell me why upon the western coast, and at almost the farthest southern extremity of her holdings, she has another great fortress.

I do not say that Great Britain contemplates war upon the United States. I say that British statesmen have sense enough to be prepared for what may happen, and that the American statesman who does not learn a lesson from that fact is not fit to represent the American people.

Mr. President, every military authority, ever naval authority tells us we need these vessels. I shall not cast many more votes in this body, but I do not propose that one of my latest votes shall be for the weakness of my country. It shall not be a vote for postponement. We can not create a war navy in a day. It requires four or five years to construct one, to train crews, to man vessels.

I am in favor of making our Navy so strong that it can meet the navy of any nation. And when that has been accomplished I am in favor of making it so strong that no two countries can successfully attack us. It will cost some money, but the annual interest on the war debt owing to us will more than build and maintain that kind of a navy. If we had possessed such a navy, England would not have insulted us as she did during the early days of the World War, and Germany would not at last have taken the action which we felt compelled us to enter the war.

The world has not changed much. We may talk a great deal, but the old sun swings through the firmament as it did centuries ago. Men and women are much the same as they were back in the twilight of time. Ambition, hope, desire, hate, and revenge still play their part in this human life. He is the most derelict of men who does not provide for his own household and for the defense of his home and native land.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, a writer some time ago said that Iowa sent JIM REED over to Missouri to raise hell, and Missouri got even by sending BROOKHART to Iowa. Maybe the time has come to even up now.

We have just listened to the greatest speech that will ever be made by the school of the old order of things, by the school that starts with cannibalism and still thinks we must defend against cannibalism. There is an old philosophy or scripture which says that "He who lives by the sword shall perish by the sword." That philosophy has come true to all the Cæsars and to the Napoleons of the whole world. I believe in that philosophy, and I believe it is now time to break up the sword. I believe that the bright light of the present leads us away from the cannibalism of the past. I believe there is a chance to stop this spirit of revenge and this desolation of war. I believe there is something in human nature greater than the efficiency of organized murder.

Three times I have volunteered in the military service of my country. I would resign from the Senate and do it again if a real cause and occasion for civilization arose demanding such action. But notwithstanding that record I am not ashamed to stand in my place in the Senate and say that I am a pacifist. I hate war. I hate everything there is in war. I hate every thought of war. It ought to be abolished now and forever. We will not abolish it by taking the old theory of cannibalism, the old theory of strife and contention, and building our institutions, our philosophies, our logic, and our armaments upon that old theory. We can not go back to the pioneer days of civilization and live in the mentality of savages if we expect to advance the civilization of the world.

I stand with those who believe that the human race is capable of something better than war in this world. I pointed out in the beginning of my address yesterday that the great result of our civilization had been the World War, and that World War was the greatest organized murder that the human mind has ever conceived. I never want to see it repeated. We may make mistakes in judgment. We may have different theories about this thing called defense. But we ought to have no difference on the theory of the way we will face upon the question of war. We ought to have no difference in the attitude we will take upon the proposition that war shall end.

The great ideals of all our leading statesmen from Washington down have been the ideals of peace. It was Washington who urged the theory that we should not go into entanglements that would produce war. We have followed that theory down until now, when we can discuss the question of ending war. We have adopted a treaty of peace to that end, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] voted for it. That is his redeeming vote in his great career in the Senate of the United States. He came, as I said once before, as the greatest objector the Senate has ever produced. The first time ever I knew the Senator from Missouri to stand for anything was when he got his so-called reservation and voted for the multilateral treaty outlawing war in all the world. I want to congratulate him upon that vote. He can go back with something affirmative to take to his great people and his great State of Missouri, and when his record is written that will be found to be the greatest vote he ever cast in this body.

And now, Mr. President, he says we ought to have warships enough so the President elect could go out fishing with one. Why, Mr. President, the first act of the next President of the United States, after he was elected to that exalted office, was to take the biggest warship we have in the Navy and go fishing, and he caught two fish, and that is the best return we will ever get out of that great warship. [Laughter.]

I had a little bit of experience about the preparation for war. I do not want to criticize the motives or the purposes of any professional soldier or naval officer. I believe they are patriotic in all their intentions, but here they are down at the War College planning imaginary wars such as the great Senator from Missouri has fought so eloquently to-day. They are there for 20 years in imaginary battles and planning these imaginary wars. A long period in imaginary activities like that takes all the common sense out of them. Let us suppose that the Senator from Missouri had been trained as a lawyer in a court of that kind. Suppose for 20 years he had fought cases in moot courts, and had imagined things, imagined evidence, imagined juries, and imagined decisions. He would not have common sense enough left to practice in a justice of the peace court instead of standing before us as one of the great lawyers of the world.

I have had some little experience with the reactionary spirit of military preparation. When I entered the Spanish War my company was issued 30 rounds of ammunition for training in marksmanship. Thirty rounds per man was all we ever had. They had to fire 10 rounds at 200 yards standing. If they made a score of 34 out of a possible 50, they were allowed to move back to 300 yards and fire the next 10 rounds. If they made a score there of 32 out of a possible 50, then they could move back to 500 yards and fire the last 10 rounds. But if they failed at any step along the line, there they stopped. The poorer they were at shooting, the less training they were to get.

This military preparation of ours, this thing that the Senator from Missouri sets up as almost divine, advanced the theory then and adhered to it until the middle of the World War that a poor shot gets more hits in battle than a good one. For 15 years as just a citizen soldier I fought that theory. I had my commission canceled in the border service because I insisted that the oldest tradition of the American Army was true and that men ought to be trained to shoot straight. I was canceled out of the Army and the Congress put me back and gave me back my commission.

Then the World War came on, and now I am going to tell something about professional preparation for the great World War. I was one of the rifle trainers of the world matches. I was left at home. I was not ordered into service at all. All of the other men who had been associated with me in the great rifle matches and in the great rifle training of the Army, the National Guard, the Navy, and the Marine Corps, were left at home. We were not ordered into the service at all. Finally, on the 21st day of October, there came a cablegram from General Pershing, after he had four and one-half months on the battlefront, stating that the training in marksmanship was defective and something must be done. The cablegram was written by Gen. Paul Malone. His was the intellect that found that this professional theory of preparation for war was not working in actual war. He had found out that the poor shot did not get more hits in battle than the good shots. So he sent that cablegram.

A few days later came another cablegram, and they kept coming every week. By and by, on the 19th of November, 1917, I was ordered into service. I was among the first of the riflemen ordered into service. I was only ordered in then because the head of the department in which I served, the Ordnance Department, had gone away temporarily. He had me on the black list for advocating the oldest American tradition of preparation. He had me at the top of the black list, too. Then a new head came into the Militia Bureau, and although he found that list with my name at the top, he ordered me into the service at once. I had known him long in the national rifle matches. He took the order down personally to the general who was temporarily at the head of the Ordnance Department and got it signed. He had two or three orders there to cover it up so the general would not discover exactly what was going on.

I was in that way ordered into the service. I was not reported to the personnel section. This officer who knew me and had been associated with me said that he was afraid to report it in there for fear they still had some stop signals somewhere.

The first the personnel section knew I was ordered there was when I reported, and then it was harder to get me out than it was to keep me from getting in. Then they ordered me over to study the new rifle the Senator talks about. There was no occasion at all for making even one of those rifles. The expert knowledge of this country ought to have kept the rifles that we had and which were a good deal better and which we were prepared to make. But they started to manufacture the new rifles, and they made new machinery, new dies, and new everything in order to make them, with a delay of many months. I studied this rifle out.

I was ordered to a division as a rifle demonstrator. That was about the same thing as a hardware salesman. I had no authority at all. It just happened that the chief of staff of the Eighty-eighth Division, when I reported to it, had been a National Guard man and had been on the Palma team, the champion team of the world, many years before. I had a Palma badge on my sleeve and he was the only Regular soldier in the division who knew what that meant. He asked me what my authority was. I told him, as I have told the Senate, but I said, "I do know how to train riflemen; I do know how to train instructors." He said, "That last is the very thing needed in this division; you will train generals and all." He wrote an order in which the commanding general instructed the brigadier generals and all officers to attend my school when I held school in their brigades. They did attend, and I had to train the officers of that division.

Then I had to come back to Washington under my orders. When I reached Washington the Chief of Ordnance had been removed and a new man was in office; but General Wheeler had some sense. We talked these matters over and he laid that report of mine, which was up to date, on the desk of the Secretary of War. I was ordered up to the Secretary of War, and he asked me about my report showing this inefficiency in the marksmanship training. I said, "The Regular Army of the United States have taught for a whole generation that a poor shot gets more hits in battle than a good one; that has been taught in all the Army schools; it is in their textbooks; it is everywhere, and on that theory you can not have efficiency." He asked me about the generals. They were the ones who had put me on the black list, and I did not hesitate to answer about them, either. At the end of it he finally asked—I had mentioned the national board—"Are you on the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice?" I said, "No, sir; one of the first things you did as Secretary of War was to remove me from the national board." He had removed me in that way, and he did it on memoranda. He asked me how that came about. I wish to recite this story because I want to give to Newton D. Baker, a civilian, the credit for starting the rifle school in the United States Army in connection with which he overruled every expert in the Army. He asked me how it happened that I was removed. I told him they sent these memoranda over to him saying that Congress had increased the appropriation for the national matches from $10,000 up to $300,000 and they needed big, broad-minded men to administer that appropriation. Then they suggested the men, and they left off all of us who had worked for and obtained the appropriation and put in a crowd that had been opposed to it. He remembered those memoranda when I called his attention to them, and he was angry about it; there is no doubt about that. In a few days he removed three of the generals whom I mentioned to him, and in a few days more he put me back on the national board. I suggested and he ordered a school to be established to train instructors for the whole United States Army.

Then he went away to France, and the Assistant Secretary of War was given that order. The War College sent for me. Then I was very welcome down there. We got up a memorandum for the school and it went through the mill until it finally reached the general who commanded in Siberia. He disapproved it. If anybody along the line of that military mill disapproved it that killed it. The Assistant Secretary of War called him in and told him that this school was one of the things that were going to happen. Then the general only wanted some little minor changes that did not make any difference to the riflemen, and we started the memorandum again from the War College up through the mill. This time it went clear up to the Chief of Staff of the Army. The Chief of Staff had just come over from the front, supposed to have been sent by General Pershing himself, and, as Pershing was cabling for new instruction in marksmanship every week, we expected no opposition would come from the Chief of Staff. But I saw the indorsement on that memorandum myself "Disapproved, Peyton C. March, General, Chief of Staff."

Then it came back again and the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell, another civilian, called in General March and told him that this school was one of the things that was going to happen in the United States Army. Then General March executed a strategic retreat, changed his mind, and approved the school. That school was ordered then. It was on the 10th day of May, 1918, when we opened the first efficient school for the training of the instructors of the United States Army.

All that delay was caused by military preparation that has excited all the eloquence of the great Senator from Missouri. That school ought to have been started a year before; it ought to have been the first thing we did start. A large part of the losses and deaths of soldiers at the front who went over without that training was due to the inefficiency of the expert militarists who prevented the establishment of that school. If we had employed just plain common sense instead of indulging in theoretical and imaginary studies of wars and battles we would have known all the time that a man armed with a rifle ought to be trained to shoot it. I had the honor to be chief instructor of that school and I had 50 assistants, all of them but two either national guardsmen or civilians. In that school we trained 7,000 officers as instructors for every division of the Army. When that had been done we were ordered south so we could continue throughout the winter. There was no idea then that the war would end so soon, and there was a month's intermission. During that month's intermission, I was sent out to the Nineteenth (Regular) Division as special instructor. This time I had some authority in my orders; I was not a mere "hardware salesman." I had authority to train that division in marksmanship.

Mind you, that was on the 1st of October, 1918. How many Regular divisions were on this side at that time? How many of our well-prepared, well-trained Regular soldiers were on the American side then, near the end of the war? Twelve out of twenty; and in that division were two of the oldest regiments in the service—the Second and the Fourteenth. There were 17 National Guard divisions, and all of them were over on the other side; there were 17 National Army divisions made up of the citizenry itself, and they were all over on the other side; but here were 20 Regular divisions, and only 8 of them ever crossed to France during the war at all. That is military preparation! One Regular officer said to me, "We have to stay on this side in order to train the civilian soldiers." Great Scotland, the civilian soldiers were all on the other side winning the war. There were none but Regulars over here. I was attached to the Nineteenth Division training them, a citizen soldier; they were not training me.

Mr. President, there is more imagination in this idea of preparation for war than there is in all of the pacifism that ever was developed in the world. I want an efficient defense for the United States; I do not want it to be aggressive or offensive in either the Army or the Navy.

The last war demonstrated the uselessness of big ships to the satisfaction of our own commanding admiral on the seas, and I believe he is right. I believe big warships are absolutely useless except for fishing schooners. I believe a little destroyer is worth more to-day than a big battleship, and a battleship is not worth much. The submarines are the most efficient arm of the Navy left. Airplanes and submarines together can put out of action all the big ships ever produced. I believe that to be the fact, and I believe that it will not be many years until I will be able to go down to my old home State of Missouri, in which lives my good friend Senator REED, whom I love like a father, and point out to him how he voted $300,000,000 worth of junk on about his last vote in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I think the Senator has demonstrated the necessity for preparedness. All we need to do is to have him do the preparing and it will be all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and is open to amendment.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if there is to be no further debate on the pending measure at this time, I think the Senator from Oregon may want to take up the appropriation bill of which he has charge.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon is ready to proceed with the Agricultural appropriation bill, I hope he will do so at once.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 15386, known as the Agricultural supply bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 15386) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the bill may be read for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that there ought to be a quorum present to consider this bill? I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] whether or not the provision to take care of forestry, particularly the recommendation coming from my State, was inserted in the bill?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not quite familiar with the item which the Senator has in mind. I will say generally, however, that the House added materially to the appropriation for 1930 over the current appropriation on items relating to the forests and forest conservation and preservation; and the Senate committee also added $10,000 to cover one item in connection with the control of insect diseases. I think the constituent whom the Senator mentions also wrote to me, as chairman of the subcommittee, and I advised him, as I recall now, that those items were pretty generally taken care of. However, the full amounts asked by some of the organizations which were concerned about the preservation of the forests have not been fully met.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the amounts were increased in practically all the cases to take care of the forestry situation, were they not?

Mr. McNARY. They were increased, yes; but not to the full extent demanded by many of the organizations.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 33, line 6, after the word "production," to strike out "$805,920" and insert "$810,920," so as to read:

Cereal crops and diseases: For the investigation and improvement of cereals, including corn, and methods of cereal production and for the study and control of cereal diseases, including barberry eradication, and for the investigation of the cultivation and breeding of flax for seed purposes, including a study of flax diseases, and for the investigation and improvement of broomcorn and methods of broomcorn production, $810,920.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the chairman of the committee? I have a communication from the agricultural college of my State, and they suggest an amendment here, as follows:

Provided further, That $7,500 of this amount may be used for investigations in cooperation with the Utah Agricultural Experiment Station.

Will the Senator accept that amendment and let it go to conference?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I did not get the particular item about which the Senator from Utah speaks.

Mr. McKELLAR. What page is it?

Mr. KING. Page 33. That, I understand, is the amendment we are considering now.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator desires to add another proviso?

Mr. KING. Yes. Will the Senator pass that item for a moment?

Mr. McNARY. I think it appertains to cereal crops and diseases.

Mr. KING. Yes; I think so.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator wants a certain amount allocated to his university for experimental purposes?

Mr. KING. The amendment which has been sent to me is as follows:

Provided further, That $7,500 of this amount may be used for investigations in cooperation with the Utah Agricultural Experiment Station.

Mr. McNARY. I shall be very glad, so far as I am able as chairman of the subcommittee, to accept the amendment.

Mr. KING. I offer the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to hear the amendment read again.

Mr. KING. The amendment reads as follows:

Provided further, That $7,500 of this amount may be used for investigations in cooperation with the Utah Agricultural Experiment Station.

Mr. McNARY. I may say to the Senator, this being an individual amendment, that the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are operating provides for the consideration first of committee amendments; and if the Senator will withhold the item at this time we will consider it a little later.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to inquire, while we are on this subject, why the Utah Agricultural Experiment Station should be singled out?

Mr. KING. There is a particular reason. I have sent for the data, and shall be glad to present them for the RECORD.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah will not insist on that amendment. I dislike to object to anything he wants; but to say that the Agricultural College of Utah shall be singled out seems to me to be a discrimination against other States. I like legislation to be general and not to single out a particular State. I have always objected to special appropriations for certain States. Make it general and I will be for it. I shall be glad to have the attention of the Agriculture Department called to the needs of Utah. That is often done.

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to submit the data in a few moments.

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 35, at the end of line 3, to strike out "$1,077,231" and insert "$1,242,231," so as to read:

Total, Bureau of Plant Industry, $4,987,843, of which amount not to exceed $1,669,500 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Forest Service," on page 44, line 13, after the word "companies," to strike out "$575,000" and insert "$585,000," so as to read:

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, in the appropriation appearing on page 50, line 23, is included $10,000 for investigations in regard to pecans. I should like to have that made immediately available on account of the disease that has given so much trouble. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will accept the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. If it does not in any way increase the appropriation, I have no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. It will not increase the appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 50, line 23, after "$169,000," insert the words "to be immediately available."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 24, after the name "Bureau of Chemistry and Soils," to strike out "$1,610,575" and insert "$1,650,075," and in line 25, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$1,075,000" and insert "$1,096,000," so as to read:

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I will ask the Senate to reject the committee amendment striking out the language in lines 19, 20, and 21.

Mr. McKELLAR. What page?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Page 52. The language in the bill makes $10,000 of the money appropriated in this act for cotton-insect eradication available in Oklahoma for this purpose. The particular part of my State affected by the boll weevil is in the Indian country, where the land is very largely nontaxable. For that reason we ask that this amount be made available as contained in the House bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this particular language was inserted in the bill on the floor of the House. It came to the Senate committee having the bill in charge, and, at the request of the department, the language was stricken out. I think it is very immaterial; and, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to have the Senate reject the language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 1, to increase the appropriation for investigation, experiment, and demonstration in reference to bee culture from $54,400 to $66,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment on page 64, line 2, to strike out "$1,298,860," and insert in lieu thereof, "$1,304,260."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is to extend the market-news service by a leased wire in the south. We received an estimate from the Bureau of the Budget, and the committee is favorable to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, that does not interfere with anything that has already been provided for?

Mr. STEPHENS. Not at all; it only extends it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment, and call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to it. On page 34, line 23, after the word "nuts" I propose to insert the word "peanuts" and on page 35, line 3, to amend the committee amendment by striking out "$1,242,231," and to insert in lieu thereof "$1,252,231."

Mr. President, the object of this is to aid the peanut industry, which is getting to be a very large industry in a dozen States. Those interests are anxious to know something about the seed in connection with peanuts. There are certain combinations of soil and seeds that will make a production much larger. I simply ask an additional $10,000 for this purpose.

Mr. McNARY. The situation has been brought to the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture since the bill was prepared and reported. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, on page 34, line 23, after the word "nuts" and the comma to insert the word "peanuts."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote by which the committee amendment on page 35, line 3, was agreed to, will be reconsidered, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia to the committee amendment to make the amount $1,252,231.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the appropriation on page 64, line 2, under the head of "Market News Service." Does that take care of the extension of the line to Nashville, Tenn.?

Mr. McNARY. That takes care of the extension of the Market News Service by a leased wire from Atlanta, Ga., to Nashville, Tenn. It was the amendment suggested by the able Senator from Tennessee before the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to line 22, page 52. Since the meetings of the committee on the bill, there has been represented to me the importance of having insect work done among the reindeer in Alaska. That industry is developing very rapidly up there, and it seems that some pest is affecting the hides of the animals so that the hides are not worth while for manufacturing purposes. I ask the Senator if he will not be willing to add $5,000 to that item in line 22.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, last year Congress provided an appropriation in excess of $30,000 for the control of ticks that prevented marketability of the hides of cattle, but there was no provision made for the hides of reindeer. That is quite an industry in Alaska, and as far as I am concerned I shall be glad to have that small item added to the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that the item be amended by making it "$88,900" instead of "$83,900."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SACKETT in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 52, line 22, strike out "$83,900" and insert in lieu thereof "$88,900," so that it will read:

For insects affecting man and animals, $88,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I will ask the clerk to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 25, line 5, after the word "jurisdiction," to insert a colon and the following:

Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may, whenever necessary, authorize the charging and collection from owners of a reasonable fee for the inspection of brands appearing upon livestock subject to the provisions of the said act for the purpose of determining the ownership of such livestock: And provided further.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is a committee amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming. I ask for its adoption.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understood the Senator from Kansas had an amendment to offer.

Mr. CAPPER. I would like to call up the amendment which I offered a few days ago, to be inserted on page 11, line 2.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let it be reported.

Mr. CAPPER. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, line 2, strike out the numerals "$1,300,000" and insert in lieu thereof the numerals "$1,580,000."

Mr. CAPPER. I would like to have read a short statement prepared by the executive committee of the land-grant colleges, in charge of the appropriation program, which will, I think, give an idea of the need for this particular amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ASSOCIATION OF LAND GRANT COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES,
January 19, 1929.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: I write on behalf of the executive committee of the Association of Land Grant Colleges and Universities to respectfully request that you favorably consider introducing an amendment to the present agricultural appropriation bill which is now before the Senate.

Such amendment should provide for restoring the sum of $280,000 to the Smith-Lever supplementary fund. This sum represents a cut from the amount of the Smith-Lever supplementary fund which is available for the present fiscal year for the conduct of agricultural extension work in all of the States of the Union.

It was doubtless assumed that the increase provided by the Capper-Ketcham bill would offset the cut above indicated. This is far from being the case, however, and after consulting with extension directors in many States, the executive committee of this association is of the opinion that this work which is carried on directly with the farmers will be seriously embarrassed by the cut.

Moreover, there are certain limitations surrounding the expenditure of Capper-Ketcham funds that are not applicable to the Smith-Lever supplementary fund, and for this further reason the above cut will seriously embarrass the States in the conduct of this work.

You will recall that the Capper-Ketcham bill provided for very necessary increase in funds for aiding the farmers by the further development of extension work, and that bill provided that any and all funds so carried were in addition to and supplementary to all present funds appropriated to extension work in the country by the Federal Government.

It is obvious that the above reduction in the Smith-Lever supplementary fund nullifies in part the intent and purpose of the Capper-Ketcham Act.

The executive committee of this association feels that in the present state of agriculture, where every assistance is needed to help the industry, it would be very unfortunate if the extension forces and program now in effect should be unduly hampered as will necessarily follow if the above cut is made in the Smith-Lever supplementary fund.

Respectfully submitted.

C. A. McCUE,
Secretary of the Association.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope very much that this amendment will be adopted. I think it should be agreed to. I think this is one of the best works that is done by the Department of Agriculture, and it is certainly one of the greatest benefits to agriculture that we could possibly extend. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. CAPPER. The Senator from Tennessee is correct. The matter was called to my attention only a few days ago, too late to be presented to the committee in charge of the appropriation. Since I offered the amendment, I have consulted with most of the members of the committee, and find them in entire agreement with the reasons set forth in the statement that has just been read, and the general feeling that it would seriously handicap the extension work if this amendment were not adopted.

Mr. McNARY. I might give the reasons for the decrease in the amount. For a number of years under the Smith-Lever Act Congress appropriated $1,300,000 for extension work in cooperation with the States. Last year the amount was increased on the floor of the House by $280,000. This year that increase was stricken from the bill, and the bill carries only the amount which has heretofore been provided for through a long series of legislation.

The difficulty is that the land-grant colleges have fixed their next year's program upon the theory that the $280,000 would be carried in the bill, and for that reason there is a decrease as compared with the appropriation of former years. However, the Capper-Ketcham bill came along this year and took up that loss by appropriating practically $500,000. The same college professors evidently worked out a plan of continuing the experimentation upon the theory of the Capper-Ketcham bill, which carried a fund for extension work of $230,000.

This matter was not brought graphically to the attention of the committee. It has developed since it concluded its consideration of the bill. I think most of the members of the committee, if not all of them, are agreeable to the increase of $280,000, which is a reinstatement of the amount carried in the bill of last year.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have just received a telegram from Prof. L. N. Duncan, of Polytechnic Institute in my State, which is one of the land-grant colleges, reading as follows:

Funds discussed with you for extension have been restored to House bill 15386 by Capper amendment and will come before the Senate for action. Your active support of this letter will be greatly appreciated.

L. N. DUNCAN.

I am in favor of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, Dr. Phil Campbell, at the head of the extension work in my State, was in Washington recently and I had him go before the committee. The committee explained to him about the new appropriation, but he said still that unless they got the amount provided by the Capper amendment, it is going to be a great inconvenience to them and is going to work a hardship on them in my State. I hope, therefore, the Capper amendment may be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana subsequently said: Mr. President, with reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas and adopted a few moments ago, I have received two telegrams to-day from the authorities of the agricultural college of my State relating to that matter, which I ask may be incorporated in the RECORD in connection with consideration of that subject.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HELENA, MONT., January 24, 1929.

Senator T. J. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.:

Informed supplemental Smith-Lever extension item omitted from House bill 15386 but restored by Capper amendment in Senate. If this does not pass will cost State college extension $11,500 and seriously cripple farm extension work. Hope you will support Capper amendment.

MELVIN A. BRANNON.
ALFRED ATKINSON.

BOZEMAN, MONT., January 24, 1929.

Senator THOMAS J. WALSH:

From information received understand Smith-Lever supplementary fund omitted from appropriation bill. Montana's allotment amounts to $11,500, loss of which would seriously disorganize extension work. Understand provision has been made to restore the appropriation by amendment to House bill 15386 by Senator CAPPER. Your support this amendment will mean much to agriculture development in Montana.

J. C. TAYLOR,
Director of Extension Service.

Mr. SIMMONS subsequently said: Mr. President, I also have two telegrams with reference to the same matter. I ask the privilege of having those inserted in the RECORD in connection with the consideration of the subject.

There being no objection the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RALEIGH, N. C., January 24, 1929.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate:

Hope you can support Capper amendment to agricultural bill restoring $280,000 for cooperative agricultural extension work. This means over $11,000 to North Carolina.

E. C. BROOKS, President,
I. O. SCHAUB, Dean.
North Carolina State College of Agriculture and Engineering.

CHAPEL HILL, N. C., January 22, 1929.

Senator F. M. SIMMONS:

As executive secretary of Southern Forestry Congress and chairman executive committee North Carolina Forestry Association, I wish to urge your interest and support for the increase to $3,000,000 for forest land acquisition authorized in the McNary-Woodruff law. This has been approved by both associations.

JOSEPH HYDE PRATT.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, I have a telegram from the president of the agricultural college of Utah in connection with the same matter, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, January 24, 1929.

Senator W. H. KING:

Capper amendment to House bill 15386 restoring Federal supplemental Smith-Lever appropriation now omitted from appropriation bill vitally necessary to support Utah extension work. Trust Capper amendment has your support. I consider situation serious and most urgent. Objection from Senate floor will be fatal.

E. G. PETERSON, President.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the able Senator in charge of the bill will recall that several times I have been agitated about poultry. I succeeded in getting the committee to adopt an amendment adding a sum of money for poultry research. May I ask the Senator from Oregon if the item we discussed has been included in the bill?

Mr. McNARY. It is in the bill at page 23, under the heading "Diseases of animals." We increased the appropriation at the suggestion of the Senator from New York, who has always been active in the interests of the poultry business, to take care of sanitation and a study of white diarrhea in chickens.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. I consider that a very important part of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a few moments ago I suggested an amendment which had been called to my attention by the Agricultural College of Utah, which is the land-grant college of my State. A letter which I have, and which contains a reference to the proposed amendment, is in part as follows:

It is likely that Federal grain-breeding funds will be sought by certain Western States. The Utah Agricultural College desires to be included on terms of equality for these reasons:

1. Though not a large grain producer in total quantity, Utah is in a geographic unit where no other college is doing breeding work; that is, Utah must do all of her own plant-breeding work.

Utah now gets no cooperative Federal funds for this purpose. Large sums, in many cases exceeding $50,000 annually, are expended cooperatively by the United States Department of Agriculture in each of the following States: Washington, Oregon, California, Idaho, Montana, Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and many others.

The Utah Agricultural College needs for plant-breeding purposes cooperative funds amounting to $5,000 to $10,000 annually on grain breeding and a similar sum on sugar-beet breeding.

In view of what other States get, and in view of being the only college in the interior mountain region, both of these sums would still leave Utah far behind almost any other State as to help received on these problems. Should there not, in all fairness, be some adjustment?

The letter is from Professor Stewart, who has charge of this particular activity in the Utah Agricultural College.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no doubt about the earnestness of the professor, but he is entirely mistaken in his statement. In all of the States mentioned there is no specific sum of money allotted for this particular purpose. All of the land-grant colleges stand on a parity. Each of them now receives, under legislation enacted by the Congress, $19,000 a year for experimental, research, and extension work in the colleges. There has been no specific sum set aside for cereal study or sugar-beet study, as stated by the doctor in his letter.

The department is figuring on making specific studies of some of the agricultural products of the country, but has not yet entered upon the scheme in the West. I am willing, if the Senator so desires and if he feels that his college is not getting recognition comparable with the other colleges in the West and throughout the country, to have a provision inserted in the bill and to study the matter in conference. I feel certain, however, that my position is correct and that the college is getting the same fair treatment the other colleges are.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah what reason there is for thinking that the Agricultural College of the State of Utah is being discriminated against and is not getting what it is entitled to in the way of experimentation. The Senator, of course, will appreciate that the rest of us would desire to see Utah fairly treated, but if that State is to be singled out for specific mention, some of the rest of us would want the same treatment for our States.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator. My understanding from Doctor Stewart is that Utah is not receiving the cooperative help that the Senator's State and other States are receiving.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems to me the Senator should take it up with the Department of Agriculture and see why a proper distribution is not being made.

Mr. KING. I will say to the Senator that the matter was not brought to my attention until quite recently. I have not had an opportunity to investigate it. I know Doctor Stewart, who is a very able man and is very much interested in matters of this character and has charge of this work in the State of Utah.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In view of the fact that the Senator does not seem to be very well informed about it, I think it would be well to let it go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered and the amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah to the committee amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 33, line 6, strike out "$810,920" and insert in lieu thereof "$818,420."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the Senator from Utah will now be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 33, line 14, before the period, insert a comma and the following proviso:

Provided, That $7,500 of this amount may be used for investigation in cooperation with the Utah Agricultural Experiment Station.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I would like to make an inquiry of the Senator in charge of the bill with reference to what is contemplated under the appropriation of $274,000 for soil survey on page 49, beginning in line 20. To be more specific, in my State we desire to have soil surveys made in a number of counties where heretofore we have never had any made. I desire to know if the appropriation would include cases of that character?

Mr. McNARY. Oh, yes. The item has been carried for a number of years, and increased from time to time. It remains in the pending bill the same as in the current law. The whole purpose is for the Department of Agriculture to make surveys and tests of soils in the various States of the Union. If the Senator finds that the work has not progressed in his State in a manner that would please him, I would suggest that he take it up with the department and ask them to increase their activities in his State.

Mr. TRAMMELL. We have had more or less surveys made there, of course; but the matter has not progressed as rapidly as it should, we think. I have had it up with the department and they have claimed that they did not have sufficient funds to go further with it. I was just wondering if the appropriation is sufficient to have the situation cared for there.

Mr. McNARY. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of the bill for certain information? Am I right in understanding that in the matter of bee culture there was an increase of $20,000 provided for?

Mr. McNARY. There is a $20,000 increase in two items covering bee culture, one for the purpose of discovering new uses for honey and the other for cultural purposes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What can the Senator tell us so far as increases are concerned under the head of "forest insects"?

Mr. McNARY. There is $10,000 for pine beetles, most of which are found in the lovely State of California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will not say that they came from Oregon, but—as to forest fires, under the Weather Bureau, was there an increase of $10,000?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; for the purpose of studying meteorological conditions in connection with forest fires and their prevention.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I wish to suggest an amendment, directing the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to page 42, line 21, where I move to strike out the numerals "$645,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$670,000," and in line 22 to strike out "$125,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$150,000." The purpose of the amendment, as will be seen, is to increase the appropriation by $25,000 for fire protection in the national forests of California. I should also suggest an amendment in line 25, striking out "$125,000" and inserting "$150,000."

The bill properly refers to four great national forests in California, the Angeles, Cleveland, Santa Barbara, and San Bernardino National Forests. The Federal Government appropriates a certain sum, and the bill provides that the State shall match that sum, which the State is more than willing to do. Fires in these national forests are very destructive, for reasons obvious to us all. Before the committee I explained why this is so. My people have expended millions of dollars in the way of protecting property outside these national forests which are endangered by fires starting within those forests. I am very earnest in urging this amendment and in asking the committee if they will not agree to increase the amount from $125,000 to $150,000, the State contributing a like amount?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from California will be stated by the clerk.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from California proposes the following amendment: On page 42, line 21, to strike out "$645,000" and to insert "$670,000"; in line 22, to strike out "$125,000" and to insert "$150,000"; and in line 25, to strike out "$125,000" and insert "$150,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I wish to suggest another amendment, directing attention to page 43, line 21, by striking out "$413,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$433,000," increasing the appropriation by $20,000 in that item. I am equally earnest in suggesting that this amendment be adopted. I hope the House will concur, but if not I will abide by the mature judgment of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 43, line 21, it is proposed to strike out "$413,000" and in lieu thereof to insert "$433,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator from California please explain why the increase should be made?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes. The Senate will observe that the appropriation deals with—> silvicultural, dendrological, and other experiments and investigations, independently or in cooperation with other branches of the Federal Government, with States, and with individuals, to determine the best methods for the conservative management of forests and forest land.

I have received many dispatches and many letters suggesting that the increased amount is necessary to carry out the work contemplated in the language which I have just read, and naturally a very important one for my State. That is about all that can be said upon the subject. It is thought that the amount carried in the bill would not enable the Government to carry on the necessary work indicated by the proposed legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator proposes to increase the appropriation by $20,000, so that instead of $413,000 it will be $433,000?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is so increased, yes; by $20,000.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then it seems that there must be some specific work in mind for which this $20,000 additional is to be spent.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I take it that there is in contemplation specific work, and judging by the amount of work to be done, the number of men employed, and so forth, the appropriation is inadequate. That is all I can, with knowledge, state. The chairman of the committee, of course, can explain the matter more fully.

Mr. FLETCHER. Did the department recommend or ask for an increase in the appropriation?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am unable to answer that question.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the department did not make a request for it, but a great many letters and telegrams reached the committee asking for the additional appropriation. It is simply to provide for an enlargement of the work that is now carried on at experiment stations in the various States throughout the country, which consists of the study of fire protection and prevention, nursery culture, the planting of trees, the study of rainfall, and the effect of trees on watersheds. It is a work of research extension with agricultural schools. There is already an experiment station in California receiving $30,000 a year, which is the average sum received by all of the 11 stations throughout the country; but in order to enlarge the work there, in order to reach, perhaps, what are called chaparral or desert trees in southern California, which are a very great fire hazard, the college there wanted to experiment on soil erosion and tree conservation for the purpose not of forestation but of watershed protection. That is the theory upon which this amendment is offered and which I have told the Senator from California I would be willing to accept and abide by the result of the judgment of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 40, line 11, I move to strike out "$6,703,000" and in lieu thereof to insert "$6,778,000."

By way of explanation, let me say that the amendment proposes an increase of $75,000 for forest-insect control work. From personal studies of the forests of the Western States, covering a number of years, I can say there is no more important work for our Government to undertake than that of forest-insect control. The Government owns nearly 160,000,000 acres of forest land, and during the last year something like 680,000 acres have been added to this acreage. The Government is trustee for the protection and care of this forest land which contains the principal watersheds of our country where the forests are being destroyed by various insect pests and by fires. When the trees are destroyed the soil is eroded; it is washed down the sides of the mountains into the canyon and the medium of water conservation is gone.

Mr. President, if we will look at the condition existing to-day in our great forest areas of the West and recall the history of China and various other countries in Asia we will not have to use much imagination to see that by neglect we are letting our great western areas revert to the desert as the vast areas in China and other countries in Asia have done.

Furthermore, as I have said, the Government is trustee for these forest areas. The pine beetle is destroying something like forty or fifty million dollars worth of timber every year in the State of California and in southern Oregon. This pest is spreading. It is threatening the destruction of the great forests in the principal watersheds of our country, which have thus far escaped destruction.

Our Government is compelled to sell the timber on large areas in its forest reserves for 50 cents on the dollar because of the ravages of the pine beetle in these areas. In one area in California it is losing a million dollars a year from this cause. It has been compelled to sell its timber there, which is infested, to a lumber company, which has agreed to cut 15,000 acres a year, because that is the only way the Federal Government can control this pest in this forest area.

The selling of that timber for 50 cents on the dollar is causing a loss to the Federal Treasury of a million dollars a year in this case alone.

I am asking for a few paltry thousand dollars in order that the Forest Service may have funds with which to combat this curse and eradicate this pest and save our Government millions of dollars a year. It will mean the stopping of this horrible destruction of our forests and watersheds, and the controlling of much of our disastrous floods.

The National Park Service has eradicated it from large areas in the national parks because it has been given a few thousand dollars for that purpose. The park rangers and employees cut down the infested trees, peel the bark, and burn it at the proper season. In that way they have controlled the pine beetle to a large extent in the national parks. On the other hand, in the national forests no money whatever has been appropriated for this purpose, and the Budget Bureau can not understand the necessity for such an appropriation.

Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be adopted. If it shall be adopted it will mean the saving of millions of dollars' worth of standing timber to the Government and people, the conservation of the soil on large areas of our watersheds, and will also conserve much of the water that is needed for reclamation and will go far in preventing floods. It will help to prevent great areas of the western region from going back to the desert.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator where that amendment comes in?

Mr. ODDIE. It comes in on page 40, line 11. It will add $75,000 to the appropriations there provided for forest-insect-control work.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I indorse everything the Senator from Nevada has just said. With due respect to the committee, I think it should have granted an increase, and I hope now that this proposed amendment may go into the bill. I could detain the Senate for an hour with a detailed statement as to the losses suffered from the pest referred to by the Senator from Nevada, but I think all Senators are familiar with the facts. I trust the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I will add one more comment in order to show an additional danger and harm caused by this pest.

The pine beetle attacks the healthy and mature yellow pine trees and kills them in a few months. When they are killed they stand as targets for lightning, and they should be cut down whenever it is possible. I personally saw two terrible fires last summer in the Mount Shasta region in California, one of which burned over a 20-mile front, doing millions of dollars damage. Both of those fires were caused by lightning striking trees that had been killed by these pine-bark beetles. When lightning strikes them they smoulder for some time, and when the wind blows the fire starts; whereas when lightning strikes a green tree it does not burn. Millions of dollars of timber are destroyed every year in the western portion of the country by fires; yet the pine-bark beetles destroy more timber every year than is destroyed by the fires. Over 50 per cent of the fires are started by lightning and a large percentage of these are the result of the pine-beetle attacks, which kill the trees and make them targets for the lightning.

I am asking for this additional appropriation because I desire to see our forests preserved and this horrible waste and destruction of our greatest of national assets stopped.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 40, at the beginning of line 11, it is proposed to strike out "$6,703,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$6.778,000."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am in accord with much that has been said by the Senator from Nevada; but, of course, there is always a limit beyond which we can not go in the appropriation bill. The House bill came to the Senate carrying an appropriation of $350,000 in excess of the appropriation contained in the current law. In addition thereto the Senate committee added $10,000 to the item.

There are a number of insects of a destructive nature which infest the various forests throughout the length and breadth of the country. I suggested to the Senator from Nevada when the bill was before the committee that probably the matter should be taken up in a general and more comprehensive way, and told him that so far as the chairman of the committee was concerned the Senator would have his assistance. I think we have treated this subject with some degree of liberality. However, I have no objection to taking the amendment to conference and see what can be done with respect to an increase.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I desire to offer another amendment. On page 52, line 8, I move to strike out "$204,000," and insert "$229,000." That is an increase of $25,000 for research work in connection with the eradication of forest insects. I originally asked for $35,000 increase. The committee only allowed $10,000 of this, and I am now asking for the balance, which is very necessary.

Mr. President, much that I have said heretofore regarding my amendment for forest insect control work can be repeated in regard to this item. It provides $25,000 additional for research work by the Bureau of Entomology of the Forestry Bureau on this insect-pest question. It is asking for a mere pittance, considering the enormity of the damage that is being done by these insect pests and the damage that threatens our country by allowing the ravages of these insects to continue.

I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the committee amendment heretofore agreed to, the Senator from Nevada proposes to insert "$229,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote whereby the committee amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have a telegram from Doctor Knapp, president of the Polytechnic Institute of my State, expressing his interest in the provision in this measure regarding soil erosion. It has been taken care of in the measure. I desire to have this telegram printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

AUBURN, ALA., January 4, 1929.

Senator J. THOMAS HEFLIN:

My attention has been called to an amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill offered by the Hon. JAMES P. BUCHANAN, of Texas, providing $160,000 for making investigations regarding causes of soil erosion and devising means for the preservation of the soil, etc. I believe this would be an excellent and important undertaking. Alabama will profit by such an investigation and will be glad to cooperate in it.

BRADFORD KNAPP,
President Alabama Polytechnic Institute.

Mr. HEFLIN. I also have a newspaper article on the subject of newsprint paper, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD following the telegram.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Muncie (Ind.) Evening Press]

NEWSPRINT CASE UP JANUARY 30—HEARING TO DETERMINE WHETHER TRUST OPPOSES USE OF WASTE

By Blair Coan

WASHINGTON, January 25.—An agreement was reached to-day between Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL, of Minnesota, author of the farm waste bill, and Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY, of Oregon, chairman of the Senate Agricultural Committee, that a hearing be held January 30 on the Schall resolution to investigate the alleged Newsprint Trust and its supposed efforts to stop the development of newsprint paper from farm wastes.

The meeting will be held in the committee room of the Committee on Agriculture in the Senate Office Building. A number of newspaper publishers, who have suggested their willingness to attend, will appear as witnesses, as will the publishers of newspaper trade papers, who have been printing articles about the formation of the so-called trust. It is thought the Department of Agriculture will not oppose the proposition.

TO BENEFIT FARMER

A statement made to-day by Julius Klein, head of the Bureau of Domestic and Foreign Relations of the Bureau of Standards, that $12 a ton can and should be paid to the farmer for cornstalks in the making of newsprint paper, would indicate that the attitude of that bureau will be friendly to the proposition. Several days ago newsprint manufacturers, who are opposing the bill, served notice on Senator SCHALL that W. E. Emley, the head of the fibrous woods department of that bureau, had changed his former ideas on this question, but Mr. Klein's unqualified statement would seemingly refute this story.

Senator HEFLIN, of Alabama, a member of the Agricultural Committee, announced to-day that he intends to lead the fight before that committee for the Schall resolution at the hearing January 30.

WASTE MADE VALUABLE

"Millions of tons of cotton stalks, capable of producing the finest white paper, rot yearly in the South," said Senator HEFLIN. "There are enough cotton stalks, cornstalks, rice, wheat, and flax straw and sugar-cane pulp rotting in the country each year to produce the $275,000,000 of white paper we annually import. I intend to discover why the Department of Agriculture is spending $20,000,000 to find a new wood process and $8,000 on agricultural wastes."

Senator DANIEL T. STECK, of Iowa, one of the Senate leaders in the fight to make farm wastes productive, said to-day, "I am not a member of the Agricultural Committee, but I intend to be present at the hearing and see why the farmers of Iowa are discriminated against and the lumber interests favored." (Copyright, 1929.)

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. It has received the indorsement of the Bureau of the Budget, but did not reach the Senate committee in time for insertion when the bill was before the committee for study.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 68, after line 9, it is proposed to insert as a separate paragraph the following:

Center Market, District of Columbia: Operation and management: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the provisions of the act of March 4, 1921, $150,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee, for the moment I fail to recall the market to which this refers.

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator from Utah that this is the Center Market; and if the clerk will be kind enough to read the report of the Director of the Budget where indicated, probably that will answer the inquiry of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BRUCE. I simply desire to ask the Senator whether——

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator bear with me just a moment? I should prefer to answer the Senator from Utah by the reading of this part of the report of the Director of the Budget. Then I shall be glad to respond to the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The purpose of this supplemental estimate is to continue the operation of this market from July 1, 1929, to June 30, 1930. An estimate for the operation of this market was not included in the Budget for the fiscal year 1930, as it appeared at the time the Budget was in the course of preparation that the site on which the market is located would be needed in the present building program of the Government. As it has now been developed that the site will probably not be required before the fiscal year 1932, funds should be provided to continue its operation through the fiscal year 1930.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon whether that relates to the farmers' market?

Mr. McNARY. No; it has no relation whatsoever to that.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether any income is derived from the rental of the market?

Mr. McNARY. I can answer that question in the affirmative. I have not the amount in mind at this time.

Mr. KING. I confess that I did not quite comprehend why so large an appropriation is required. I was very much opposed to the Government taking over the market. I think it was very unwise, and it has been an improvident enterprise. However, we have it in our hands; and if that is the amount which the Agricultural Department demands, I suppose it will get it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 68, line 12, it is also proposed to strike out "$2,232,200" and to insert in lieu thereof "$2,329,200."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the clerk of the committee may have the privilege and permission to change the totals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee with respect to the appropriation for what is known as liver fluke. What does the bill provide in that respect?

Mr. McNARY. On the item of liver fluke the committee allowed $5,280, the amount estimated for by the Department of Agriculture and the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. They thought that was sufficient?

Mr. McNARY. That was all that was asked for; yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course, this is a legislative body, not the Budget Bureau.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, yes; certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does it have the approval of the Director of the Budget?

Mr. McNARY. The department estimated for $5,280, and that estimate was supported by a favorable report of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. So it meets with the approval of the Director of the Budget?

Mr. McNARY. And it met with the approval of the committee having in charge the bill, and I hope it meets with the approval of the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It ought to be more, but I shall, of course, accept what is granted.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon how much the department asked for originally from the Budget Bureau; whether more than this amount was asked for for this item?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the department always makes two estimates. One is the preliminary estimate, where the sky is the limit. The other is the minimum beyond which they can not go; and in that minimum estimate the amount was $5,280. In the sky-line estimate it was $10,000.

Mr. ODDIE. The livestock association of my State has asked that this full $10,000 increase be placed in the bill, and I believe that other Western States have sent in a similar request. I will indorse the request of the Senator from California in this matter if he cares to propose the amendment, or I will offer it myself.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I certainly do. My recollection is that $20,000 was asked for.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have been extremely generous in these matters, and Mr. Mohler said that that is all he cared for. If Senators are going to persist in this proposition too far, I shall invoke the rule.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not regard that as a threat, but as a gentle reminder.

Mr. ODDIE. Under these circumstances, I will not press the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 4 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 31, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, January 30, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Holy and loving Father, we are moved with wonder and praise when we recall how Thou dost provide for us. May Thy marvelous creation and Thy merciful providence incline our hearts to deep and reverential gratitude and thanksgiving. Hear us, though we are so filled of imperfections; we wait for Thy blessing. We are so thankful for the chivalry and for the home coming of those heroes who have just returned from where only God has been. Continue to increase and unfold our knowledge of justice, equity, of the rights of man, and of the necessities of the state. Ever keep us from confusing moral principles and hold before us the vision of truth, which is the grandest scepter that ever directed the thought of man. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 350. Joint resolution to provide for the reappointment of Frederic A. Delano and Irwin B. Laughlin as members of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 14800) entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers, sailors, and marines of said war," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana, Mr. NORBECK, and Mr. GERRY to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1731) entitled "An act to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories."

FIRST DEFICIENCY BILL FOR 1929

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules for printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 303

Resolved, That the bill H. R. 15848, an act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, be taken from the Speaker's table, the Senate amendments be disagreed to, a conference be requested with the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and the managers on the part of the House at said conference be appointed without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, by authorization of the Committee on Appropriations, I present the appropriation bill for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, and ask that the report be printed to accompany the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16714) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Union Calendar and ordered printed.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

RELIEF OF B. C. MILLER

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11859, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11859. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11859) for the relief of B. C. Miller.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give us just a brief statement of the meaning of the amendment?

Mr. MICHENER. The amendment makes no change whatever in the purpose or meaning of the bill. It is just a change of phraseology. There is better language in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—DEFICIENCY BILL

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, several gentlemen have requested to know when we would take up the rule to send the deficiency bill to conference. We expect to take it up to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of business on the Speaker's table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 12236. An act to provide an appropriation for the payment of claims of persons who suffered property damage, death, or personal injury due to the explosion at the naval ammunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. J., July 10, 1926, and to provide a means for further investigation and payment in certain cases;

H. R. 14150. An act to amend section 279 of the Judicial Code; and

H. R. 14452. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to donate to the city of Oakland, Calif., the U. S. Coast Guard cutter Bear.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill and joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 1731. An act to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories; and

S. J. Res. 198. Joint resolution to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the presidential inauguration ceremonies in 1929.

RETURN OF SENATE BILL 4222

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a resolution of the Senate, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Ordered, That the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 4222) entitled "An act to authorize the creation of Indian trust estates, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the bill referred to in the Senate resolution was one which was introduced in the Senate by Senator THOMAS of Oklahoma. Senator THOMAS informs me and requests me to say to the membership of the House that this bill was fully considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, reported out unanimously, and passed the Senate without objection. On Saturday afternoon Senator THOMAS, the author of the measure, was temporarily absent from the floor of the Senate. Another Member of the Senate, without consultation with the author of the bill, lodged this request. I have great respect for the body at the other end of the Capitol, but in view of the facts I have stated I am objecting to this request.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this bill passed the Senate in April or May of last year. The time for reconsideration in the Senate passed long ago. It came to this House, was referred to the proper committee, was given consideration there, and reported to the House by the Committee on Indian Affairs last May.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. A similar bill to this, introduced by myself, was reported to the House. The bill asked to be returned is now in the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman means an identical bill?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma objects.

CALL OF COMMITTEES

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

NEZ PERCE TRIBE OF INDIANS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 12520, which is on the Union Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand, of course, that the purpose of this request is expedition in the consideration of the bill. Are any of the bills which the gentleman is going to call up to-day controversial and bills which will take any elaborate explanation, or are they bills generally agreed upon in the committee?

Mr. LEAVITT. Every bill I shall call up to-day has been agreed on in the committee. It is not my intention to call up to-day those bills which are probably considered most controversial, although there are following this bill two jurisdictional bills which often cause some debate. I will state to the gentleman that the purpose of my request is not to shut off debate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If bills are likely to entail a considerable amount of debate the request ought not to be made, because that involves the necessity of asking unanimous consent for the extension of time every five minutes. Of course, I realize that this is a matter that ought to be largely controlled by the discretion of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CRAMTON. As I understand, the present request has to do only with the one bill referred to?

Mr. LEVITT. Oh, yes. My request has to do only with the one bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that the Committee on Indian Affairs works so harmoniously together that there is no opposition to its bills?

Mr. LEAVITT. Well, I might hope that was the case but it is not always so.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal by either party to the Supreme Court of the United States, notwithstanding lapse of time or statutes of limitation, to hear, determine, adjudicate, and render final judgment on all legal and equitable claims of whatsoever nature of the Nez Perce Tribe of Indians in Idaho, or of any band thereof, against the United States, arising under or growing out of the original Indian title, claim, or rights of the said Indian tribe or any band thereof, including all title, claim, or rights growing out of treaties of June 11, 1855 (12 Stat. 957), and June 9, 1863 (148 Stat. 673), and an agreement of May 1, 1893, approved by act of Congress of August 15, 1894 (28 Stat. 286), with the said Nez Perce Tribe or bands of Indians, in connection with the Nez Perce Indian Reservation in the States of Idaho and Oregon, and more particularly as to the following claims:

1. Claim for compensation for that part of the Old Agency land and improvements near Fort Lapwai, Idaho, reserved from sale by the agreement of May 1, 1893, between the United States and the Nez Perce Tribe of Indians (28 Stat. 286), and thereafter disposed of by the United States without compensation to said Indians and described as follows:

"Commencing at a point at the margin of Clearwater River on the south side thereof, which is 300 yards below where the middle thread of Lapwai Creek empties into said river, run thence up the margin of said Clearwater River, at low-water mark, 900 yards to a point, run thence south 250 yards to a point, thence southwesterly in a line to the southeast corner of a stone building partly finished as a church, thence west 300 yards to a point, thence from said point northerly in a straight line to the point of beginning."

2. Claim for certain lands included in canceled allotments within said Nez Perce Indian Reservation in Idaho and thereafter disposed of by the United States, said lands not being included in the area ceded by said treaties or said agreement of May 1, 1893 (28 Stat. 286), to the United States and also certain erroneous per capita payments out of the amount appropriated by Congress in payment for lands ceded to the United States under the said agreement of May 1, 1893 (28 Stat. 286).

3. Claim for gold mined and removed by white men, without authority and in trespass, from the Nez Perce Indian Reservation lands in Idaho prior to the treaty of June 9, 1863, and its approval or ratification by the Senate on April 17, 1867 (14 Stat. 647), ceding such lands to the United States.

SEC. 2. Any and all claims against the United States within the purview of this act shall be forever barred unless suit or suits be instituted or petition, subject to amendment, be filed in the Court of Claims within five years from the date of this act, and in any such suit or suits said Nez Perce Tribe of Indians, or any band thereof, shall be party or parties plaintiff and the United States shall be the party defendant. The petition of the said Indians shall be verified by the attorney or attorneys employed to prosecute such claim or claims, under contract with the Indians, approved in accordance with existing law, upon information and belief as to the facts therein alleged and no other verification shall be necessary. Official letters, papers, documents, records, maps, historical works, and affidavits in official files, or certified copies thereof, may be used in evidence and the departments of the Government shall give access to the attorney or attorneys of said Indians to such treaties, papers, maps, correspondence, reports, documents, or affidavits as they may require in the prosecution of any suit or suits instituted under this act.

SEC. 3. In the said suit or suits the court shall also hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate any claims which the United States may have against the said Indian tribe, or bands thereof, or any of them, and any payment or payments which have been made by the United States upon any such claim or claims shall not operate as an estoppel, but may be pleaded as an offset in such suit or suits, as may gratuities, if any, paid to or expended for said Indian tribes or bands, or any of them.

SEC. 4. Any bands of Indians associated with the Nez Perce Tribe deemed necessary to a final determination of any suit or suits brought hereunder may be joined therein as the court may order: Provided, That upon final determination of the court of any such suit or suits the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to fix and determine a reasonable fee not to exceed 10 per cent of the amount recovered, or in the event of any compromise settlement and adjustment of any of the foregoing claims by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, then such officers shall have jurisdiction to fix and determine a reasonable fee not to exceed 10 per cent of the amount secured in such settlement or adjustment, to be paid to the attorney or attorneys employed as herein provided, and such fees shall be paid out of any sum or sums adjudged to be due said tribe or bands, or any of them, and the balance of such sum or sums shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of such tribes or bands where it shall draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

With the following committee amendment: On page 3, beginning in line 16, after the word "States," insert:

such claim, in any event, not to exceed one-eighth of the amount of gold so mined and removed: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as creating any rights which may be made the basis of a legal or equitable cause of action but shall only authorize the said Nez Perce Tribe of Indians to present to the United States Court of Claims for adjudication such legal rights and claims, if any, which may exist under the treaties and agreements mentioned in this act.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: On page 5, line 23, strike out the period at the end of the line and insert the following:

The amount of any judgment shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Nez Perce Tribe of Indians and shall draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, and shall be thereafter subject to appropriation by Congress for educational, health, industrial, and other purposes for the benefit of said Indians, including the purchase of lands and building of homes, and no part of said judgment shall be paid out in per capita payments to said Indians.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by striking out all reference to the period being stricken out. It is a new sentence and the period should remain.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will so modify the amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I will only state that this amendment is in line with the amendment that was placed in the California Indians' claim bill and in several subsequent bills. It is in line with the policy that seems desirable to avoid per capita payments, but to make use of these judgments in a way beneficial to the Indians.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I recognize the attitude of the House upon the language of the proposed amendment. These particular claims have been pending for a good many years, and I would not be justified in asking the House at this time to modify the course of action it has taken on similar language involved in other claims.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, in view of the agreement of the author of the bill, the committee, of course, can interpose no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection now to urge to this amendment, as the matter referred to in the bill does not affect my State. However, I just want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is only a declaration of policy and, of course, does not bind the action of any subsequent Congress. I have no objection to the amendment, but just wanted to call attention to the fact that this is just a declaration of policy on behalf of Congress and, of course, could not bind any subsequent Congress in the disposition of this money provided that Congress wanted, by a conflicting amendment, to repeal this provision.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Of course, this Congress can not legally bind any subsequent Congress, but, to a large extent, this Congress can morally bind the beneficiaries of this legislation, and to some extent subsequent Congresses. Without such a proposition as this, some of us who take a very much different attitude toward these claim bills would oppose their passage; but with this kind of a provision there is not the same basis for opposition there would otherwise be. Hence the legislation is passed by reason of the acceptance of this provision by those speaking here for the Indians.

Having so accepted it, it would appear for the benefit of the Indians, that future Congresses should not lightly change it. There is a certain moral obligation that will exist but no legal obligation.

Mr. HASTINGS. I agree with the gentleman it is only a moral obligation and does not bind a subsequent Congress. I wanted to make that clear.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEAVITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COOS BAY, LOWER UMPQUA, AND SIUSLAW TRIBES OF INDIANS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 13692) for the relief of the Coos (Kowes) Bay, Lower Umpqua (Kalawatset), and Siuslaw Tribes of Indians, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House therefore automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BEEDY in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims, with right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States as in other cases, to hear, determine, and render final judgment in all claims, legal and equitable, that the Coos (or Kowes) Bay, Lower Umpqua (or Kalawatset), and Siuslaw Tribes of Indians, in the State of Oregon, have against the United States.

The Court of Claims shall advance on its docket any suit or suits instituted hereunder, and shall have authority to determine and adjudge the rights, both legal and equitable, of the claimants in the premises, notwithstanding the lapse of time or statutes of limitation.

The suit or suits instituted hereunder shall be begun by the Coos (or Kowes) Bay, Lower Umpqua (or Kalawatset), and Siuslaw Tribes of Indians as parties plaintiff against the United States as party defendant.

The petition or petitions may be verified by the attorney or attorneys employed by the plaintiffs to prosecute the suits, and no other verification shall be necessary.

Official letters, correspondence, papers, documents, and public records, or certified copies of the same, may be used in evidence; and the departments of the Government shall give access to the attorney or attorneys for the Indians to said papers, correspondence, and records for use in the preparation and prosecution of such suits.

That upon final determination of any suit hereunder the Court of Claims shall determine such fees as it shall find reasonable to be paid to the attorney or attorneys representing the plaintiffs in the case, and the amount thereof, together with all proper and reasonable expenses incurred in the preparation and prosecution of the suit, shall be paid out of the judgment: Provided, That in no case shall the fees awarded exceed 10 per cent of the amount of the judgment.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and render final judgment in any and all legal and equitable claims of the Coos (or Kowes) Bay, Lower Umpqua (or Kalawatset), and Siuslaw Indian Tribes of the State of Oregon against the United States arising under or growing out of the original Indian title, claim, or rights of the said tribes (with whom no treaty has been made), in, to, or upon the whole or any part of the lands and their appurtenances occupied by said tribes in 1848 and long prior thereto, and embraced within the following description, to wit:

"Beginning at a point of rocks, known as Five Mile Point, in section 19, township 27 south of range 14 west of the Willamette meridian, Coos County, Oreg.; and running thence north along the coast of Oregon, to the mouth of a creek, known as Ten Mile Creek, in section 27, township 15 south, range 12 west, Lane County, Oreg.; thence east on the watershed between the waters of the Alsea and the Siuslaw Rivers to the summit of the Coast Range Mountains in township 26 south, range 7 west; thence in a southeasterly direction along the summit of said mountains, the same being the southwest boundary of the lands ceded by the Calapooia and Willamette Tribes of Indians, to the junction of the Calapooia Range, near the headwaters of the Siuslaw River, in township 21 south, range 4 west; thence in a westerly direction following the summit of the ridge between the waters of the Smith and the Umpqua Rivers, the same being the north boundary of the lands ceded by the Umpqua and the Calapooia Indians, to a point due north of the head of tidewater on the Umpqua River; thence south across the Umpqua River to the summit of the mountains dividing the waters of Camp Creek from the waters of the Umpqua River, the same being the west boundary of the lands ceded by the Umpqua and Calapooia Indians; thence in a southeasterly direction along the summit of the Coast Range Mountains, following the southwest boundary of the lands ceded by the Umpqua and the Calapooia Indians, to the summit of the divide separating the waters of Looking Glass Creek from the waters of the South Fork of Coos River in township 27 south, range 8 west, Douglas County, Oreg.; thence west to the point of beginning, which lands and the appurtenances thereunto belonging, including, among the other things, claimants' original means of securing a living thereon and therefrom by hunting, fishing, and otherwise, the said tribes claim were taken from them, and appropriated by the United States to its own use, in or about the year 1855, without any treaty cession or agreement, and without compensation to the tribes therefor.

"SEC. 2. In any suit instituted hereunder the Court of Claims shall have authority to determine and adjudge the rights, both legal and equitable, of the claimants in the premises, notwithstanding lapse of time or statutes of limitation, and the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States is hereby granted to both parties.

"SEC. 3. The court shall also hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate any claim or claims, including gratuities, which the United States may have against the said tribes properly chargeable in such suit; but any payment or payments which have been made by the United States upon any claim or claims of the tribes shall not operate as an estoppel but may be pleaded by way of set-off; and any other tribes or bands of Indians which the court may deem necessary to a final determination of such suits may be joined therein as the court may order.

"SEC. 4. If in any suit instituted hereunder for the value of unceded lands taken, sold, or disposed of by the United States it be determined by the court that the Indians are entitled to recover judgment, the price of such lands shall be limited to $1.25 an acre, except as to any tracts that have been actually sold or disposed of under laws enacted by Congress establishing higher prices; in which case the court may be governed by the latter prices.

"SEC. 5. Any and all claims against the United States within the purview of this act shall be forever barred unless suit be instituted or petition, subject to amendment, filed as herein provided in the Court of Claims within five years from the date of the approval of this act; and such suit or suits shall make the Coos (Kowes) Bay, Lower Umpqua (Kalawatset), and Siuslaw Tribes of Indians of the State of Oregon party or parties plaintiff and the United States party defendant.

"The petition shall be verified by the attorney or attorneys employed to prosecute such claim or claims under contract with the Indians approved in accordance with existing law.

"Official letters, papers, documents, maps, and records, or certified copies thereof, may be used in evidence, and the departments of the Government shall give to the attorney or attorneys so employed access to such treaties, papers, maps, correspondence, and reports as they may require in the preparation or prosecution of any suit or suits instituted hereunder.

"SEC. 6. Upon final determination of such suit or suits the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to fix and determine a reasonable fee, not to exceed 10 per cent of the recovery, together with all necessary and proper expenses incurred in the preparation and prosecution of such suit or suits, to be paid to the attorney or attorneys employed, as herein provided, by the said tribes, and the same shall be included in the decree, and be paid out of any sum or sums adjudged to be due, the balance to be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said tribes, where the money shall draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until paid."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Coos (Kowes) Bay, Lower Umpqua (Kalawatset), and Siuslaw Tribes of Indians of the State of Oregon to present their claims to the Court of Claims."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to the committee amendment at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is not in order at this time to offer amendments. General debate alone is in order, which is limited to two hours. One hour will be controlled by the chairman of the committee; and if there is anyone who desires to claim time in opposition to the bill, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill relates to three tribes of Indians in the southwestern corner of the State of Oregon whose lands were taken from them by the United States Government.

In 1854 the Secretary of the Interior instructed an agent of the department by the name of Joel Palmer to enter into an agreement with the Indians similar to the agreements entered into with Indians generally. The Indians met the representative of the Government by appointing members of their tribal councils to confer, and they agreed upon an arrangement with the representative of the Government by which they were to have reservation lands and such other concessions as were made to Indian tribes generally.

They agreed to this in good faith and expected that the Government would ratify the treaty. However, the Senate never ratified this treaty, but the Indians have always conformed to the terms of the treaty arrangements and complied with every request made on them by the Government.

In 1856, when tribes farther south began a war that was known as the Rogue River Indian War, these Indian tribes refused to join, but gave aid and assistance to the white people and aided in the suppression of that Indian insurrection.

The Government, in order to protect the Indians, and also to protect the white settlers in the way thought advisable, removed these Indians from the lands that they had long occupied. They had small villages along the rivers, with comparatively substantial dwellings, and were supporting themselves as a peace-loving and peace-observing people. The Government removed them to a tract of land farther north and kept them there for awhile, and afterwards gradually allowed them to disperse and did nothing for them.

These Indians have been making such living as they can by working in logging camps, in sawmills, in canneries, by fishing, and by working on farms; but they have always felt that since they observed their side of the treaty faithfully that the Government ought to recognize its obligation when it assured them, through the proposed treaty, and took advantage of its unratified provisions, that if they would do the things they have done and are doing, the treaty would be ratified, and this is presented on their behalf by the committee and the people interested in the matter.

If there are any questions I will be pleased to answer them. I think I have stated the general outline of the bill.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question and also direct it to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. This bill and the bill which preceded it relate to Indian claims 50 or 60 or 70 years old apparently.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. What is the explanation of the extraordinary situation of having these bills here at this time with respect to these unsettled claims? It seems to me quite extraordinary that these matters have not been settled in some way long before.

Mr. LEAVITT. I will state to the gentleman that the entire reason is this: These Indians have been trying to get into the Court of Claims, just as many other tribes have been trying to get into the Court of Claims, to present what they consider to be just claims, but the law is such and the situation is such that they can get into the Court of Claims only by being allowed in by an act of Congress.

This is a matter that has been under consideration by various Congresses and it is a matter that the Committee on Indian Affairs feels should have been adjudicated many, many years ago.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Then these bills represent a default in duty upon the part of the Congress of the United States, is that right?

Mr. LEAVITT. It could perhaps be stated that way, but perhaps it would be as well to state it in this way. My personal judgment is that our entire approach to this question of claims on the part of Indian tribes has been faulty; that many years ago we should have created a court of Indian claims that would have had jurisdiction to consider matters of this kind and in that way we would have gotten them out of the way a long time ago. This would have been very important in the civilization of the Indians, to remove from their minds the idea that they have something coming from the Government or that we should pay them what they have coming from the Government and have the matter closed; but this kind of a measure has never been passed. I intend to introduce such a measure in the next Congress.

In the meanwhile we are considering in the committee these different matters as they come to us in the form of separate bills. We are considering them in the subcommittee upon which there are two former members of the bench. They are redrawn and put in a form which we think will receive the support of Congress and give these people an opportunity to present their cases and close them up.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. As a matter of fact, most of these claims do not represent legal rights on the part of the Indians or legal obligations against the Government, as I understand it. They are addressed to the sense of equity, fairness, and justice of Congress just as other claim bills which are not based on legal rights.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the treaty had been ratified they would have had a legal right, but now it depends on the good will and assistance of the Government, based on a just claim.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That happens to be the specific reason in this case. Then I think we are getting a little more liberal in opening the doors for this class of claims.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Would not the gentleman say a little more just?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That depends on each individual case. I think, too, the Indians themselves, either directly or through representatives, are pressing the matters harder.

Mr. HAWLEY. These Indians and their representatives have for years kept this matter alive, urging that the treaty be ratified or some legislative action taken by Congress.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I have no doubt of that as to a matter in which my friend from Oregon has been interested.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield.

Mr. NEWTON. As I understand the facts, while the treaty was never ratified, yet the leaving of the land by the Indians, and their occupancy by the United States, was carried out just as if the treaty had been ratified?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; the Indians went on in good faith and left the lands expecting that the treaty would be ratified and that they would be given their rights.

Mr. NEWTON. And further, the lands have been opened up for settlement?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; a great part of the lands are now in private ownership and a great part in the forest reserves.

Mr. NEWTON. The United States Government has received all of the benefit just as if the treaty had been ratified?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; and the Indians have acted on their part just as if the treaty was ratified so far as the Government itself is concerned.

Mr. NEWTON. Why, under these circumstances, has there been such a length of time elapse when the Government has accepted the benefits of the treaty?

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the gentleman from Minnesota can answer that question as well as I can. It has been the delay in Congress—I do not know of any particular reason, but it has been one of those things that has never been settled.

Mr. LEAVITT. Is not the situation something like this: It has been hinted at by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] that we have become more liberal—I would say we have come to see the justice of these claims more clearly in recent Congresses than in the past; we have approached more closely to the problem of fitting the Indians into our civilization and citizenship, and have come to realize more fully than formerly the necessity of dealing justly with these people in order to accomplish that object.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is not this also true, that the bills of late are drawn much more carefully by the Committee on Indian Affairs, drawn in a way to protect the Government's interest much more fully, drawn in a way to protect the interest of the Indians against unscrupulous attorneys; in other words, the bills coming in now are bills drawn in a reasonable way to reasonably protect the interest of the Indians rather than, as they used to be drawn, bills favorable to the claims of attorneys?

Mr. HAWLEY. I think there has been a great improvement.

Mr. CRAMTON. The bills as drawn now do not do away with the rights of the Government as many bills did that were drawn in other days, but protect the rights of the Government as well as the rights of the Indians.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON].

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I hardly think it necessary to go into any further discussion with reference to the bill before the House, as that has been thoroughly covered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], who introduced the bill, and by the chairman of the committee. I rise more especially to say a few words with reference to jurisdictional bills generally.

I have had the honor to be chairman of the subcommittee in charge of these bills for the last several years, and our subcommittee has made it a rule not to report any bill where the Indians or their representatives have not been able to make out a prima facie case. In other words, we feel that no bills should be reported out unless the Indians or their representatives can convince us that they have a claim which is just and which ought to be adjudicated in some tribunal. There are before our committee at the present time at least a dozen bills on which the committee has taken no action, and we have taken no action because sufficient evidence has not been offered to show that there is in fact a valid, legal, or equitable claim. I do not believe our Court of Claims should be cluttered up with a lot of claims and suits which have little or no merit. Such claims ought not to take up the time of the court. This court is already greatly burdened with a large number of cases. It is behind several years now with these Indian cases, and if we permitted all sorts of claims to go into the Court of Claims to be taken up in their order it would mean that many claims that had real merit could not be considered for the next 10 or 12 years.

The subcommittee has also tried to use a great deal of caution in watching the form of these bills. If the draft submitted is not in such form as to meet with the standards set up by the Committee on Indian Affairs, the subcommittee has redrafted the bill so as to make it conform to the general standard which has been adopted by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it will be noted that in the bill before the House everything has been stricken out after the enacting clause, and the bill completely rewritten. In doing that we had two purposes in mind. First, to clarify the language; and second, to set out the specific claims on which the Indians are suing, so that the Congress will be apprized of the nature and character of the claim. It formerly was the practice to pass bills with general language, under which suit could be brought on every conceivable kind of claim without reference to its merits or legal or equitable basis. We have tried to obviate that by specifying in the bills the laws and treaties under which the Indians are seeking to recover, so that the Congress will have some notice of the character of the claim and its probable amount. Another thing that we have sought to do is to incorporate in the report accompanying the bill sufficient data with respect to the claims upon which recovery is sought to enable Members of Congress who read the report to form some judgment of their own as to whether the bill ought to be enacted into law. So in the present case you will find a fairly complete report of the matters in controversy.

Personally I believe that the sooner we can enact jurisdictional bills to permit Indians with just claims to come into the Court of Claims, the better it will be for the Indians and for the country. In other words, I think it is harmful to the development of the Indian and to his progress to have him feel that he has been robbed of his property and has had no opportunity to present his claim to the Court of Claims or any other tribunal; and because this is so the policy of the committee has been, and probably will continue to be, to report out all bills where the Indians have been able to make out a case showing that they have a just cause of action.

JACKSON BARNETT CASE

A good deal has been heard with reference to Jackson Barnett, a Creek Indian of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, who was married to a white woman nearly nine years ago, and who about three years after his marriage made a distribution of part of his estate by giving a portion to his white wife and providing for another portion to be held in trust during his lifetime, he to receive the income and then upon his death the amount to go to the American Baptist Society as an endowment fund for the Bacone College, an institution of learning for Indian boys and girls, and Murrow Orphan Home, an institution for the care of Indian orphans, both located at Muskogee, Okla.

It will be of interest to the Members of the House to know what a leading newspaper, published in Oklahoma, has to say regarding it, and I therefore want to submit an editorial from the Tulsa World, published at Tulsa, Okla., in its issue of January 16, 1929:

RESULTS ALL THAT COUNT

Jackson Barnett, the Indian millionaire ward of the Government, plunged into a whole lot of grief when he permitted himself to be married to a white woman. It may be remembered that the rich Creek had little to say in the matter of his mating, but the volume of litigation and conversation he stirred up by his surrender to the tender passion has more than made up for his own reticence. The Barnett marriage, with its accompanying legal entanglements, has occupied much space in the public prints for several years.

The contention usually has been between Mrs. Barnett and either the Indian Service at Washington or one of several courts. Much stress has been laid by the Indian Bureau on the manner of Barnett's marriage and the motives that inspired the fair lady to seek the illiterate, unkempt old Indian for a mate.

If there was collusion with reference to the affairs of Barnett that is another matter, but the fact stands out prominently that whatever may have been the motive, or purpose, however selfish it may have been, nobody has contributed as much toward his comfort and care as the woman who inveigled, if she did inveigle, him into marriage. She found him in a hovel, living in filth and dirt, and without proper food or raiment, and she dressed him up and elevated and improved his standard of living. The old Indian says he never has been so happy and had as many comforts of this world in all his life as he now has.

The donation, made to the Bacone University at Muskogee, which is dedicated to the care and education of Indian children, was probably better spent than it would have been if it had been given a lot of lawyers and litigants claiming heirship.

Viewed from a practical point of view, Jackson Barnett is getting more out of his wealth than he has ever gotten before and nobody is being harmed, except those anxious to put their hands upon some of his wealth. If the Indian Rights Society, or any other uplift society, would look upon it with a little more common sense they would be able to see that, as far as Jackson Barnett is concerned, he has been benefited rather than injured by the attachment he formed with his lady love, and certainly the money he gave the university could hardly be put to a better purpose. So, after all is said and done, it isn't far from the mark to say that the case of Mr. Barnett has been handled by the Department of the Interior wisely and directly for his interest and welfare.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to yield any more time as no one has asked for time. I ask that the Clerk read the bill for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk again reported the bill, reporting the committee amendment.

On line 3, of page 6, of the committee amendment, the Clerk was directed to correct the spelling of the word "amendament."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON to the committee amendment: Page 7, line 6, after the word "paid," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "and shall be thereafter subject to appropriation by Congress for educational, health, industrial, and other purposes for the benefit of said Indians, including the purchase of lands and building of homes, and no part of said judgment shall be paid out in per capita payments to said Indians."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOWELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 13692, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEAVITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE KANSAS OR KAW TRIBE OF INDIANS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 8901.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana calls up the bill H. R. 8901, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8901) to amend and further extend the benefits of the act approved March 3, 1925, entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any and all claims, of whatever nature, which the Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians may have or claim to have against the United States, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. DOWELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any and all claims, of whatever nature, which the Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians may have or claim to have against the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1925, be, and the same is hereby, amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims, notwithstanding the lapse of time or statutes of limitation, to hear, examine, adjudicate, and render judgment in any and all legal and equitable claims which said Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians may have or claim to have against the United States, growing out of or arising under any treaty or agreement between the United States and the Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians, or arising under or growing out of any act of Congress in relation to Indian affairs, or for the misappropriation of any funds of said tribe, and for use of any funds of said tribe for purposes not for its material benefit, which claims have not heretofore been determined and adjudicated on their merits by the Court of Claims or the Supreme Court of the United States.

"SEC. 2. Any and all claims against the United States within the purview of this act shall be forever barred unless suit be instituted or petition filed, as herein provided, in the Court of Claims within three years from the date of approval of this act, and such suit shall be prosecuted in the name of said Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians as plaintiff, upon petition No. F–64, now filed in the Court of Claims, and any amendment thereto that may be necessary under the provisions of this act, by the attorneys now representing said Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians in said case No. F–64, and all the evidence and proceedings filed in said case No. F–64 shall be received and accepted by the court to the same extent as though filed anew in the suit or amendment filed under this act. Official letters, papers, documents, and records, or certified copies thereof, may be used in evidence, and the departments of the Government shall give access to the attorneys of said Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians to such treaties, papers, correspondence, or records as may be needed by the attorneys of the Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians.

"SEC. 3. In said suit, the court shall also hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate any claims which the United States may have against said Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians, but any payment, which may have been made by the United States, upon any claims against the United States, shall not operate as an estoppel, but may be pleaded as an offset in such suit.

"SEC. 4. That from the decision of the Court of Claims in any suit prosecuted under the authority of this act, an appeal or other appropriate proceeding may be taken by either party as in other cases to the Supreme Court of the United States.

"SEC. 5. That upon the final determination of any suit instituted under this act the Court of Claims shall decree such amount or amounts as it may find reasonable to be paid the said attorneys of the Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians for their services and expenses as said attorneys: Provided, That in no case shall the aggregate amounts decreed by said Court of Claims for fees be in excess of a sum equal to 10 per cent of the amount of recovery against the United States.

"SEC. 6. The Court of Claims shall have full authority by proper order and process to bring in and make parties to such suit any or all persons or tribes or bands of Indians deemed by it necessary or proper to the final determination of the matters in controversy.

"SEC. 7. A copy of the petition shall in such case be served upon the Attorney General of the United States, and he, or some attorney from the Department of Justice to be designated by him, is hereby directed to appear and defend the interests of the United States in such case."

The committee amendments were read as follows:

On page 2, line 3, after "1925," insert "(43 Stat. L. p. 1133)."

On page 2 strike out line 14, after the word "affairs," and all of line 15 and line 16 to and including the word "benefit."

On page 3 strike out that portion of line 3 following the word "act," and all of line 4 and line 5 to and including the figures "F64."

On page 3, line 18, after the word "payment," insert "including gratuities."

On page 4, line 9, after the word "States," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add "and in no event shall such fees exceed the sum of $50,000."

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER].

The CHAIRMAN. Does any one desire to speak in opposition to the bill? If not, the gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, the background for this claim may be of some interest to the members of the committee giving some consideration to the relationship of the Indians to the National Government. It pictures very vividly the vanishing American, more so perhaps than any other relationship with any other tribe. Our first treaty with the Kaw Indians was made in 1815. They were a peace-loving tribe of Indians. They voluntarily placed themselves under the protecting care of the United States Government. At that time they were in possession of and owned a vast scope of territory extending on both sides of the Kansas River clear to the foothills of the Rocky Mountains; in addition, a vast tract of land in Missouri. Then, in 1825, another treaty followed in which the United States Government secured a vast portion of that land, consisting of something like 7,000,000 acres, and in that treaty it promised—listen to the language—that the remainder "shall be the home of the Kaws forever." Then, in 1846, another treaty was negotiated with these Indians and all their land taken away to become the public domain in consideration that the United States Government would furnish them "a suitable home" elsewhere in the eastern part of the State. That was done; and, mark you, the domain of the Indians was diminished during these years from 7,000,000 acres of land to 255,000 acres. Without detailing the treaties and negotiations diminishing the lands of the Indians, even that reservation was finally taken away by the Government in exchange for a reservation for them in the Osage lands in Oklahoma. The reservation continued to diminish until it has become so small as to be no longer self-supporting.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORTON D. HULL] asked a question just a short time ago in reference to why these claims were being presented so long after the transactions. In regard to a great many of them, it is because of the continuing administration on the part of the Government, and especially is that true with the Kaws. By means of numerous treaty negotiations through the years the Government acquired all this land, administered all the funds they had, the rentals from all the lands they had, collecting all the revenues that came in and administering them, and had never accounted for them during all the years prior to the accounting of the Dawes Commission of July 8, 1904.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Do you mean that the administration of Indian affairs had been continually changing in personnel?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; and I mean also that the administration of Indian affairs was continuous. It was a continuous responsibility on the part of the Government to administer the affairs of the Kaws.

In 1902 a treaty was entered into between the Kaws and the United States. It was subsequently ratified by an act of Congress of July 1, 1904. The Government agreed that it would render an accounting to the Kaw Indians for its administration, extending back to 1826.

In this agreement the United States said, "Why, yes; we will account. We will cast up our accounts; but we must appoint the commission that does it." So it authorized the Secretary of the Interior to appoint a commission composed of the officials and employees of his department, having all the records and books in their possession; records of their own administration and of their own administrators, to settle up an account with the Indians for this long period of administration. To audit their own books and settle on their own figures was unconscionable. It should have been fair enough to say to these incompetents, "We will appoint an impartial commission; a commission composed of a personnel that is capable of giving a judicial quality to their service." The Secretary of the Interior appointed the commission from the officials and employees in his department, and the commission proceeded for two years in auditing the books of their own department, finally rendering its report.

Under the language of the agreement, they were to render without delay an accounting to this tribe of Indians. But they never did it. They made a final report. They did not say, when they were about to complete their accounting, "Now, you come in and look it over and see if it is right. If you have any suggestions to make we will be glad to consider them, and if there are any mistakes we want to correct them." They did nothing of the kind. They concluded their report and filed it, and two or three months later they served it on these Indians.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Is this the tribe of Indians to which the Vice President elect belongs?

Mr. GARBER. Yes. The Vice President elect owns an allotment in the reservation. It is said he ought to be a little more aggressive in championing their cause.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Montana, the efficient chairman of the committee.

Mr. LEAVITT. In behalf of the Vice President elect, should it not be said, when he is charged with not having been as aggressive as he might have been, that the reason is that he would have been charged with doing it on is own behalf, because he is interested in the reservation?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; that is true. It might then be said he had a personal interest in the property and was using the influence of public position to promote his individual interests.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that the Vice President elect is noted for his modesty?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; as well as for his high ability.

Mr. LEAVITT. The Vice President elect was talking to me in regard to Indian matters recently, and I think it should be stated in reference to him that he is very much interested. He has been keen for the welfare of the Indians during all his long public life, and the only reason that could possibly suggest itself to my mind why any gentleman should possibly criticize his action is that this is his own tribe and allotment and criticism can not be made of him for having been too active in his own behalf.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. With reference to the interest of the Vice President elect in matters affecting not only this tribe of Indians but also other tribes, I am quite familiar with his interest because of contact with him for a number of years in conferences on the Interior Department appropriation bill. In the recent political campaign, a pamphlet was circulated very widely, attacking the gentleman, then the candidate for Vice President on the Republican ticket, who was chosen as Vice President at that election, attacking him on the ground of his connection with the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes. That pamphlet, a copy of which I have, was circulated at the instance of one John Collier, the executive officer of the American Indian Defense Association. The subject matter of it was prepared under his direction. It was entirely characterized by the same willful misrepresentation and disregard of truth generally as characterize his fulminations against those who do not do his bidding in Indian matters. Nothing that has been issued by that gentleman has more completely demonstrated his unreliability and his undesirability as a spokesman in Indian matters than that unjust attack on the Vice President elect. That was accompanied by similar attacks, inspired from the same source, not only upon the Vice President elect but of the entire administration of Indian matters for several years past.

However, it is interesting to note that notwithstanding the wide distribution of those attacks in the campaign, the vice presidential candidate, and the party for which he stood, were overwhelmingly indorsed in every State having any Indian population whatever.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Oklahoma, in calling attention to the fact that the Vice President elect was a member of the Kaw Tribe of Indians, did so for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the high class of the Kaw Indians. [Applause.]

Mr. GARBER. I think it can be reasonably said that the Vice President elect, as a citizen and as a statesman, has worn well through all the years. He has demonstrated the quality of material necessary and essential for good administration in government, and his record and his service to the country reflects credit upon his tribe as well as upon himself and the American people.

In one of the most difficult positions of high public service he has demonstrated his ability as leader of the Senate. His actual service to the country in that position has demonstrated his qualifications for Vice President second to none of his predecessors. As a citizen of Oklahoma, adjoining the State of Kansas, I may be pardoned for saying that in my judgment, he is one of the best all-round qualified persons ever elected to that position. [Applause.]

Before leaving the pathetic side of the vanishing domain of the vanishing Kaw, permit me to call your attention to what the commission said of this tribe and our treatment of them. Here is what they say:

> One of the first acts of the Kansas Tribe of Indians—

There they were called Kansas Indians but afterwards they were called Kaws—

> when entering into treaty negotiations with the Government, was to place themselves under its guardianship and protecting care. At that time they were possessed of a large and valuable property which they from time to time relinquished to the Government, and which, if it had been judiciously managed in accordance with treaty stipulations, would have left them one of the richest and most independent of Indian tribes.

Fully consider that statement—

> If the trust had been honestly and judiciously administered.

Well, who was administering the trust? The United States Government. And what was the consideration? The lands and property they had taken from the Kaws. I read further:

> On the contrary, their financial condition has never been prosperous, but they have lived in large measure since the first cession of their lands upon the bounty of the Government; which goes to show in what manner the trust reposed by the Indians has been administered. For these reasons alone, if there had been no other, they are entitled to magnanimous treatment at the hands of the Government in the settlement of their present claims.

[Applause.]

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. What is the date of that report?

Mr. GARBER. July 8, 1904. The act ratifying this treaty conferred jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine every item that went into this accounting, and it was right that it should do so.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. AYRES. That was the opinion of the Court of Claims?

Mr. GARBER. No; this is not the opinion of the Court of Claims. It is the treaty itself as ratified by the act of Congress.

Mr. AYRES. Has it ever been referred to the Court of Claims?

Mr. GARBER. There is a suit now pending in the Court of Claims, and we are now right up to that proposition. The act of 1925 conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims limited the jurisdiction conferred in the act of 1904 ratifying the treaty so as to exclude this accounting. It excepted the accounting by the commission from the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. GARBER. The purpose of the bill is to open the door that the treaty opened, and which the act of Congress approving the treaty opened, which was that the Court of Claims should have complete jurisdiction of all the claims between the parties. And that is the purpose of this bill, and the only purpose. It is to give the Court of Claims complete jurisdiction of all these accounts. The purpose of the bill is simply to open the door and give the Court of Claims jurisdiction of all these matters in dispute between these parties and to afford both parties an impartial tribunal for the adjudication of all matters in dispute—a forum wherein the vanishing Kaw must be permitted to stand upon an equality with Uncle Sam—and the conscience of the American people will be satisfied with nothing less. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER. I note that the department has made an adverse report on the bill. I was opposed to the bill; but after listening to the very clear presentation of the matter by the gentleman, I must necessarily reach a conclusion to support the bill. It is one of the finest arguments I have heard on the floor of the House on any bill. [Applause.]

Mr. GARBER. I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin.

An adverse report of a department should have no terrors for a Member of Congress. Who composes the Congress of the United States? Who exercises the legislative jurisdiction of this country? It is true there is an adverse report on the part of the Secretary of the Interior. I think it is not to his credit either, because good conscience and equity and justice could not do otherwise than favorably report this bill. What are his grounds? What are the grounds of disapproval? It is simply because it does not meet the economic program of the President of the United States. What has that got to do with the administration of justice and the conscience of the American people? [Applause.]

The Clerk read the bill for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, after the figures "1925," insert "(43 Stat. L. 1133)."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Page 2, line 14, after the word "affairs," strike out the balance of line 14 and down to and including the word "benefit" in line 16.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Page 3, line 3, after the word "act," strike out the balance of line 3 and down to and including "F-64" in line 5.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Page 3, line 18, after the word "payment," insert the word "including gratuities."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Page 4, line 11, after the word "States," insert the words "and in no event shall such fees exceed the sum of $50,000."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill, but I hope my colleagues will not adopt this amendment but will vote it down.

I do not believe this kind of amendment placing an additional limitation upon attorneys' fees ought to be inserted in this or any of these bills. Let me call the attention of the committee to the fact that we have just passed two jurisdictional bills, H. R. 12520 and H. R. 13692, with this limitation eliminated.

Let us see what section 5 does. It limits the amount of attorneys' fees to 10 per cent. They can not be in excess of that and they are further limited to the finding of the Court of Claims. After the services have been completed then the work of the attorneys before the Court of Claims is resubmitted to the Court of Claims and the Court of Claims within the contract and within the 10 per cent fixes the amount of attorneys' fees.

I call your attention to the fact that if this amendment further limiting the attorneys' fees is eliminated, then the provision will correspond exactly with the two bills we have heretofore passed to-day. I am glad to know there are so many here who are earnest in their support of the Indians.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will be pleased to.

Mr. CRAMTON. In the past, the gentleman knows, extortionate fees were permitted, but the attempt of the Committee on Indian Affairs of late has been to safeguard the Indians against that and the requirement that is in the bill restricts the fees to 10 per cent of the amount recovered. As I understand it, if we pass these bills with such a provision, the Court of Claims does not necessarily take 10 per cent as the rule.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true.

Mr. CRAMTON. But does make an examination of the facts in the case and fixes a fee to correspond with the equities——

Mr. HASTINGS. With the services rendered.

Mr. CRAMTON. But within a maximum of 10 per cent.

Mr. HASTINGS. It can not exceed that.

Mr. CRAMTON. I sympathize much with the views of the gentleman from Oklahoma, based upon the fact that I understand the Court of Claims will make the examination and fix the fees within 10 per cent and not necessarily go in every case to the maximum of 10 per cent.

Mr. HASTINGS. I heartily agree with that and I agree with the suggestion that the court ought to do it, and as I understand it, the court does do that.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Has the gentleman made a motion to strike out the $50,000?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am opposing that amendment, and I trust it will not be adopted, for the reason we have just now passed two jurisdictional bills with that sort of a provision eliminated. It will then restrict the amount of the fees to 10 per cent and leave it to the Court of Claims to determine after reviewing all of the services that have been rendered by the attorneys in the case.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. If the gentleman will yield further, I may state that in the original bill the attorneys' fees were limited to $25,000, but it was perfectly apparent to the subcommittee that had the bill under investigation that in this particular instance $25,000 was an insufficient amount. This occurred about a year ago. After some consultation with the attorneys in the case, they expressed themselves as being satisfied with a limitation of $50,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; they reluctantly did that because they felt that they had to do it in order that they might get some favorable consideration of the bill, but I think that is wrong in principle.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I agree with the gentleman. I think the limitation of not to exceed 10 per cent is the proper limitation, but I think the House should know how it came about that this limitation of $50,000 was placed in the bill. Since this bill was considered by the Indian Affairs Committee, conferences with those Members who have heretofore insisted upon limiting the attorneys' fees to a specific sum have resulted in a general agreement upon a provision which will authorize the Court of Claims to fix the fee, provided such fee shall in no case exceed 10 per cent of the amount recovered.

Mr. HASTINGS. I hope the House will vote down the amendment, and I understand that is agreeable to the author of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes on the amendment—not in opposition, but in regard to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment?

Mr. LEAVITT. No; for that reason I am asking unanimous consent, the time having expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee now is on the amendment itself.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the position of the Committee on Indian Affairs on this point ought to be made plain. The circumstances under which this limitation of $50,000 for attorneys' fees was placed in the bill has been stated by the gentleman from South Dakota, Judge WILLIAMSON, who is the chairman of the subcommittee. It was a matter of agreement, and it was because at the time the bill was originally before the House and became a law in 1925, demand was being made that these limitations be placed on them. That demand was being made very largely under the belief—and it was rather prevalent in the House—that there had been an abuse on the part of the Court of Claims in fixing these attorney fees to the disadvantage of the Indians; that too great a percentage had been paid under the action of the Court of Claims.

It should be stated in the RECORD that there has been no such abuse on the part of the Court of Claims. On the contrary, if we take the record of the 23 cases in which Indian claims have been adjudicated, going back to 1895, we will find in those instances in which the fee was fixed by the Court of Claims itself that in only one or two cases has the percentage of 10 per cent been exceeded, and those were instances in cases many years ago. I am going to quote a few of the more recent cases. I think if we go back 10 years we will have cases acted upon by the present members of the Court of Claims.

In 1918 there was a case of the Omaha Indians against the United States, where there was a recovery of $122,295.31, and the Court of Claims allowed a 10 per cent fee in that case, a fee of $12,229.53, which, of course, is only one-quarter part of the amount set out in the limitation now before the House.

Another case in 1922—two tribes of Sioux Indians against the United States—in which there was a recovery of $386,597.89, and the Court of Claims allowed a fee of 10 per cent, or $38,659.78, which is again less than the limit set in this bill.

In 1926 the Yankton Band of Sioux against the United States recovered approximately $310,000, and the attorney fees allowed were only $25,000, or 8 per cent. I presume in that case some limitation had been set upon the attorneys' fees, but of that I am not sure. These are the only cases in the last 10 years in which the fees have been fixed by the Court of Claims. The fees have been fixed through the history of 23 cases, partly by the courts, partly by contract through the department, and in one case by the Comptroller of the Treasury. If you take all of the apparently large fees, going back through that period of years, beginning in 1895, you will find that the average fee is only 9.7 per cent, even including the few cases in which apparently large fees were allowed upon the facts presented, and those large fees are not excessive in regard to the total amount paid the attorneys.

So there is no such situation as the House seemed to think there was.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The tabulation to which the gentleman refers, and of which I have a copy, refers to certain judgments and the percentages. It does not show what the limitation was in the acts. That is what I am most curious to know. I am curious to know whether the Court of Claims always gives the maximum permitted by the act. In the case the gentleman refers to, the Sioux case in 1922, there was an attorney's fee of 10 per cent. I suppose that was the maximum that the act permitted.

There was a case in 1927 where again 10 per cent was allowed. I suppose that was the maximum in the act. Now, in the Yankton Sioux Band case there was allowed 8 per cent—$25,000. It would appear that that was the maximum permitted by the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. On the other hand, there was the Michigan Pottawatomie case, in 1895, where the fee was 35 per cent. I am curious to know whether that 35 per cent was fixed by the Court of Claims or by the act of Congress. In other words, I want to know whether the Court of Claims, when no limitation was put in the act as to the percentage, allowed a 35 per cent fee, which is an unreasonable and improper allowance. I am inclined to assume that the fee was fixed by the act of Congress, and not by the Court of Claims. I would be glad if the gentleman from Montana would insert in his remarks in this connection the tabulation to which reference has been made, adding to it one column that will show what was the limitation in the act.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I can not get that insertion in my remarks to-day, but this committee has another Calendar Wednesday next week, and I shall be glad to have the Indian Office prepare that more complete tabulation. The only point that I am trying to make is that in the last comparatively few years, during which the present members of the Court of Claims have been on the bench, there is no evidence of that court's having been excessive in any of the fees that it has allowed, and even if we defeat this amendment we are not removing the limitation. We are saying here that it shall be 10 per cent, but that we will not put upon it the further limitation of $50,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have not been speaking in criticism of the Court of Claims. I think that statement is not full enough to enable us to judge. I have a good deal of confidence in what the court will do provided they understand that we mean that the 10 per cent limitation is not necessarily a minimum as well as a maximum.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD in connection with my remarks a memorandum with respect to the famous fee of $750,000, which has been discussed many times on this floor. It has nothing to do with the action of the Court of Claims, and it is in such form that I think it would be very informative to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The memorandum referred to is as follows:

MEMORANDUM RELATIVE TO THE $750,000 FEE OF MESSRS. MANSFIELD, M'MURRAY & CORNISH

Relative to the $750,000 fee of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish for certain services rendered as attorneys for the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, the facts are set out in the findings of fact made by the United States Court of Claims in connection with its decision of July 1, 1926, in the case of J. F. McMurray v. The Choctaw Nation and the Chickasaw Nation (62 Ct. Cls. 458–470). The court's statement relative to the above-mentioned fee and the services of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, for which the above-mentioned fee was awarded by the Choctaw-Chickasaw Citizenship Court, is as follows:

"By act of Congress of June 10, 1896 (29 Stat. 321, 339), the Dawes Commission was authorized and directed to make citizenship rolls of the members of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians in Indian territory; and an appeal to the United States courts in the territory from the decision of the commission upon the application of any person for enrollment as a citizen of any of said tribes was authorized by said act. Appeals from decisions of the Dawes Commission to the said United States courts were taken in a large number of Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship cases, involving the citizenship of about 3,600 persons, known as 'court claimants,' about 2,300 of whom were held by said courts to be entitled to citizenship. The Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations contended that most of these persons were not entitled to citizenship and that the court decisions holding them entitled to citizenship had been fradulently procured; and under the advice of their said attorneys in citizenship matters, Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, set about to secure a review of said court decisions.

"On January 17, 1901, a written agreement was entered into between said attorneys, Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, and the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, acting by their respective executives pursuant to authority granted by acts of their legislative bodies, the general councils of said nations, employing said attorneys to represent said nations, in preventing allotment or distribution of tribal property to the said 'court claimants' and providing for a contingent compensation to them of 9 per cent of the value of the tribal property that would be saved to said nations by the denial of citizenship to any or all of said claimants, said compensation to be for both past and future services of said attorneys to the end in view.

"Said attorneys, Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, used their best endeavors toward the accomplishment of the purpose of their employment as set forth in said agreement of January 17, 1901; and in the said act of July 1, 1902, a Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship court was created to determine the validity of the court decisions in the said 'court claimant' cases, such determination to be by the retrial of said cases before the said citizenship court, the tenure or life of which court was at first limited to expire December 31, 1903, but which was subsequently extended to December 31, 1904.

"The said agreement of January 17, 1901, was submitted by Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish to the Department of the Interior on or about February 10, 1903, for approval, and was approved by the Secretary of the Interior on or about February 20, 1903, on condition that the percentage of the fee should be 5 per cent instead of 9 per cent, with a further limitation of the fee to a maximum of $250,000. This modification of the agreement was not accepted by Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, and a provision was secured by them in the Indian appropriation act of March 3, 1903 (32 Stat. 982, 995), vesting the said citizenship court with authority to fix the amount of said fee.

"Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish represented the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations in the suits in the said citizenship court, amounting in all to 263 suits, and involving the citizenship rights of about 3,403 applicants for citizenship, of which number all but about 156 were excluded from citizenship, and the allotments they would otherwise have received were saved to said nations. Upon the completion of its work in December, 1904, said citizenship court fixed the fee for the said services of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish at $750,000, which was about 52 per cent of the 9 per cent fee provided for by the said agreement of January 17, 1901, with said nations. The language of the court in fixing the amount of the fee was as follows:

"'In our opinion the compensation fixed by the contract would be excessive, but the sum of $750,000 would be a reasonable compensation and should be allowed the firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish for all services connected with citizenship matters under the contract dated January 17, 1901, and in lieu of all expenses save and except such as are provided for by law, as set out in section 33 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, and said amount is hereby fixed and allowed as a reasonable compensation to said attorneys in this behalf.'"

Said fee was subsequently paid Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish by or in behalf of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman has no objection to the phraseology of this bill with reference to the fee, has he?

Mr. LEAVITT. I have no objection, and I have no objection to removing the $50,000 limitation.

Mr. HASTINGS. So that that would be uniform in all these jurisdictional bills?

Mr. GARBER. This is the language in this bill:

Provided, That in no case shall the aggregate amounts decreed by said Court of Claims for fees be in excess of a sum equal to 10 per cent of the amount of recovery against the United States.

That leaves with the court judicial discretion based on the services rendered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment in lines 11 and 12 on page 4.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk an amendment to be inserted on page 4, line 11, after the word "State."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 4, line 11, after the word "State," insert the following:

"The amount of any judgment, after payment of such fees and expenses, shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians, and shall draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, and shall be thereafter subject to appropriation by Congress for educational, health, industrial, and other purposes for the benefit of said Indians, including the purchase of lands and building of homes, and no part of said judgment shall be paid out in per capita payments to said Indians."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information. Is it not a fact that most of these Kaw Indians have had their restrictions removed, and have certificates of competency?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; many are competent, and are very successful business men, engaged in different occupations.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I am wondering about the propriety of tying up and leaving in the Treasury to be appropriated money that we find due these individuals who have their certificates of competency.

Mr. CRAMTON. We are spending some money for these Indians, and I know that when the time comes for an appropriation they are all very poor Indians. It may be that some of them with restrictions removed are no longer in a position to involve any expense to the Government. Possibly a little different action is required here than in the other bill. Generally this is the policy that ought to be followed. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER] was already discussing that feature of the case with me when the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD] rose. My suggestion was that this go on its way to the Senate, and let the matter be thoroughly threshed out and see what the effect is, and then the House, if it desires, can consent to any proper change.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. It is his bill.

Mr. GARBER. Why prejudice the bill with an amendment which we see in such instances should not apply. This is an exceptional case.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I am not yet convinced it does not, because when we have up appropriation bills we make appropriation for these Indians, and then they are "poor" Indians. Now this bill has an adverse report from the Budget and some of us would scan it much more carefully if it is to go in the form of a gratuity to a lot of rich nonrestricted Indians.

Mr. GARBER. It is not going in the way of a gratuity in this bill. Where is there any appropriation in this bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. There will be one if they win the suit.

Mr. GARBER. It will be only the money to which they are justly entitled. There is no gratuity coming from the United States Government.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Let me make the suggestion that the gentleman's amendment be so written as to apply to the restricted Indians——

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will permit, the amendment in question I submitted to the committee, and I suggested this to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER], and now this comes up as a surprise. I have said to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER] I am willing to investigate the matter further in connection with any amendment the Senate might make and then be prepared. On the other hand, I do not like to surrender this principle for Indians for whom we are making appropriations for health, education, and so forth. We just allow them to squander foolishly the amount of the judgment and then we go on and pay for their education and health.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I am not asking the gentleman to surrender his policy as to the restricted Indians. The point I am bringing out is I do not see the justice of holding money that is found to belong to men having a certificate of competency and not restricted.

Mr. GARBER. Exception should be made of those members from whom restriction has been removed.

Mr. CRAMTON. The trouble with that is this: That in many cases restrictions have been removed unwisely, and the Indians speedily lost everything they had, and now it is being urged upon us in many cases where we should provide for these unrestricted Indians just the same as the restricted Indians. If these 91, or some of them, are wealthy and are no burden to the Government, that is one thing, and I would like a little opportunity to find out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. MICHENER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BEEDY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8901, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEAVITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CLAIMS ARISING UNDER INDIAN IRRIGATION PROJECTS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 13977) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to settle claims by agreement arising under operation of Indian irrigation projects.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana calls up the bill H. R. 13977. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13977) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to settle claims by agreement arising under operation of Indian irrigation projects.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13977, with Mr. BEEDY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13977, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay out of funds available for the Indian irrigation projects for damages caused to owners of lands or other private property of any kind by reason of the operations of the United States, its officers or employees, in the survey, construction, operation, or maintenance of irrigation works of such projects and which may be compromised by agreement between the claimant and the Secretary of the Interior, or such officers as he may designate: Provided, That the total of any such claims authorized to be settled as herein contemplated shall not exceed 5 per cent of the funds available for the project under which such claims arise during any one fiscal year.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to settle claims by agreement arising under operation of Indian irrigation projects."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] is recognized for one hour. Is there anyone who desires to speak in opposition to the bill? If no debate is desired, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, the author of the bill [Mr. SMITH] does not wish to take up any time on it, and I do not care to speak. I ask that the Clerk read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill for amendment.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. MICHENER having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BEEDY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 13977) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to settle claims by agreement arising under operation of Indian irrigation projects, had directed him to report the same back without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended.

On motion of Mr. LEAVITT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ON SOBOBA INDIAN RESERVATION, CALIF.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 15092.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15092) to authorize an appropriation to pay half the cost of a bridge on the Soboba Indian Reservation, Calif.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill being on the Union Calendar, the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15092, with Mr. BEEDY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15092, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an appropriation of $11,000 is hereby authorized, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay not to exceed half the cost of the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the San Jacinto River near the Soboba Indian Reservation in the State of California, including the cost of surveys, plans, estimates, and specifications, and other necessary expenses connected therewith, on condition that the State of California or the county of Riverside provide the remainder of the cost, and under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, who shall also approve the plans and specifications therefor: Provided, That before any money is spent hereunder the State or county shall agree in writing to maintain the bridge and approaches without expense to the United States or the Indians.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to authorize an appropriation to pay half the cost of a bridge near the Soboba Indian Reservation, Calif."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] is recognized for one hour. Is there anyone who desires to speak in opposition to the bill?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, this is a proposal whereby the Government will have the benefit of the cooperation of the county of Riverside in the building of a bridge which is essential to the utilization of the Indian property of which the Government is the trustee.

The Soboba Indian Reservation consists of 4,450 acres, all of which lies on the north side of the San Jacinto River. The town of San Jacinto lies on the south side of the river. San Jacinto City is the only source of supply for the people who live on the reservation. During high water in winter the San Jacinto River can not be safely forded, and, therefore, the occupants of the reservation are cut off from the bases of their supplies because they can not get to town.

Also the Indian children on the reservation have to attend the public schools in the city of San Jacinto. When the river is up it is impossible for the Indian children to get across to go to school, and they are interrupted in their attendance at school.

In addition to that the Mission Indian Hospital, which is the hospital for about 8 or 10 Indian tribes in southern California, is located on the Soboba Reservation.

Recently we made a $30,000 addition to the hospital, which increased its capacity. It is impossible to get across the river to this hospital at high water, and a number of hardships and unnecessary suffering—including some maternity cases—have resulted from the inability to get across the river to this hospital at high water. There used to be a bridge there, which was built by the local people. It was not a very good one, and it washed out in a storm about two years ago. It has not been replaced.

The county of Riverside feels that it does not have by itself enough interest in the proposition to justify it building a new bridge at its own expense, which would be primarily for the benefit of the Indians. It is willing, however, to comply with the terms of this bill. It is willing to pay half the cost of the bridge and approaches and agrees thereafter to maintain it at its own expense, without further contributions from either the Government or the Indians.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will not need all of that time.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to call the attention of the committee to what kind of a precedent this bill would constitute if passed. I realize that if the committee wants to establish that kind of a precedent it will do so.

We have had a good deal of difficulty about getting money for the building of roads and bridges on Indian reservations. All through the years there has been a crying demand for roads and bridges on Indian reservations, but we have not been able to build them as fast as was really desirable. However, this year we have entered on a program of $250,000 a year for the building of roads and bridges on Indian reservations, but that appropriation is tied up with a limitation requiring the use of Indian labor, other than for engineering and supervision. In other words, that $250,000 is to be highly beneficial to the Indians, not only because of the roads and bridges constructed but because of the labor it will furnish to those Indians.

We have in some cases, where a river constituted the boundary of an Indian reservation, put up our half of the cost of a bridge across such river, but this is the first time that I know anything about where it has been seriously proposed that we should go outside of an Indian reservation, not in contact even with the boundary of the Indian reservation, and build a road or build a bridge on a highway outside of the reservation. This is a bill to have the Federal Government pay half the cost of a bridge that is not on a reservation or in contact immediately with it, it being something like half a mile away from the reservation.

There has been a great deal of attack on the policy of the Government with reference to Indians. The fact is that no Government has ever treated any aboriginal race with one-tenth the generosity that this Government has shown toward the Indians in this country. There is no place where there is more of criticism of the Government than in California; no place where they demand more of the Federal Government and pay less than in California, and yet here is a case where they come and ask us to develop the roads on a reservation and not only to feed and clothe those Indians when they are destitute, but to pay half the cost of building a bridge. They are citizens of California and they are voters in California. We are not only to provide them their health and education, but now they want us to go some distance from the reservation and pay half the cost of building a bridge.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. What is the distance?

Mr. CRAMTON. A half mile, I have stated.

Mr. LEAVITT. I think not.

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, I will say that to-day I inquired of the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but unfortunately the telephone service was not quite perfect and when the message came back, instead of getting me they got the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PERKINS], who is now present, and he was kind enough to give me the message. I think I quote him correctly when I state that the message from the Indian Office was to the effect that the bridge was a half mile from the reservation.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman has correctly stated the fact.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am fortunate in that I have an independent witness.

Mr. LEAVITT. The gentleman from California, who comes from that district, will make a statement with regard to the exact situation. We do not question that the gentleman from New Jersey got that information over the telephone, but we do question that those are the facts.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I would like to ask the gentleman from California whether there is a school on this reservation for these children?

Mr. SWING. No; there is no school on the reservation for these children. The Indian children have to go to the town of San Jacinto, which is on the opposite side of the river, in order to get their schooling, and their schooling has been interrupted each winter during high water through their inability to ford the river.

Mr. CRAMTON. The statement of the gentleman from California is an admission that the State of California, or the county, is not willing to bear its share of the burden. If we provide for their schooling, the State of California ought to build its own bridges on roads outside of the reservation and roads that serve whites as well as Indians. I do not know just what kind of a road this is or where it goes, but my understanding is that it is not exclusively a road to reach the reservation, but is a road which serves other white communities.

Now this amount of $11,000 is not so bad, but I think, as long as we are having difficulty in building all the roads and bridges on Indian reservations that are needed, that we ought not to start the policy of going outside a reservation and building those roads and bridges, and inasmuch as these Indians are citizens of California and their development and progress will add to the future of California, I think the State and this county ought to be delighted to build a bridge outside of the reservation that may be incidentally used by these Indians.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I beg your indulgence for further imposing upon your time. I can appreciate what the gentleman from Michigan has in mind in fearing the establishment of a precedent by going off of a reservation to build a bridge, and I think that such proposals should be scrutinized carefully, and I am willing to have this particular proposal carefully scrutinized.

Of course, there must have been some reason why the Indian Service, after carefully investigating this matter from last year to this year, would favor this proposition, and the reason is this: While a bridge can be built across the river on the reservation and thereby bring it within the precedents of which the gentleman from Michigan has approved in the past, yet to do so would cost $60,000, while by going about 100 yards off of the end of the reservation there is a narrow place in the river where it is possible to build the bridge at a cost of only $22,000, and I am sure that the gentleman from Michigan, under this particular and peculiar set of facts, will say that it does not establish a bad precedent but that it constitutes the use of common sense and good business judgment to save both the Federal Government and the local people the extra cost of the bridge.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. Of course, the statement I get is that it is half a mile, which statement they gave me after some examination of the files; but under the gentleman's statement, if the bridge was built on the edge of the reservation, the share of California, on a half-and-half basis, would be $30,000, but by going up to this other point, half a mile or so from the reservation, they get out of it for $22,000, even if we do not take any share in it, and I think they ought to be satisfied with that material saving.

Mr. SWING. The trouble is that the local community, which is merely the county—as a matter of fact, it is only one road district—that feels at all inclined to pay, are unwilling to support a proposition under which each side would have to pay $30,000, and it was through the investigation of the county engineer that this present proposal was evolved, which has been approved by the county, by the Indian Service, and by the Budget officer in charge of this particular kind of expenditure.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Can the gentleman tell us where the road goes after it leaves the village and goes on to the Indian reservation?

Mr. SWING. That is as far as I have been, but I am told that beyond the reservation a road of some kind goes on up the canyon to a few white settlers. It goes primarily to the reservation. There are few people living beyond. I will say that there are some white settlements before you get to the reservation on the left-hand side, but the road and the bridge is primarily for the occupants of the 4,450 acres of Indian reservation.

Mr. CRAMTON. And it serves very materially those white developments above?

Mr. SWING. But for that the local interest would not feel justified in the expenditure of $11,000. Certainly it does serve some purpose for the white people as well as the Indians, but it is primarily for the benefit of the Indians, and I see no possible objection that can come from putting the bridge where it can be built most safely for its maintenance and most cheaply for its original cost and thereby reduce the share which the Government usually would have to pay in a case of this kind.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield further? I will grant the gentleman all the time he wants.

Mr. SWING. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. I wonder what the attitude of California or of this county would be when it comes time, and perhaps is now, to build a road across the Indian reservation to connect up with this bridge and to let these white settlers get from their holdings across the Indian reservation to the bridge. When it comes time to build that road across the Indian reservation to serve very materially the whites above, is the State or the county prepared to pay one-half the cost of that highway? If they would make that agreement I think I would have no objection to our paying one-half the cost of the bridge outside.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. SWING. If the gentleman will permit, the white settlers beyond the Indian reservation, to which he is referring, are very few in number, and I can not think of a time when the county would be interested in asking the Government to pave a way through the reservation for only a dozen settlers or so who are doing a little dry farming on a hillside.

Mr. CRAMTON. Are there not more than that? It is my understanding there are more whites above the reservation to be served by this bridge than there are Indians on the reservation.

Mr. SWING. If that is so, I do not know it. There are some people, as I have said, after you cross the bridge, that live on the turn to the left, whereas the turn to the right takes you almost immediately onto the Indian reservation.

I thank the gentleman for the time he has yielded to me and I yield back to him the remainder of the time.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to state that the committee gave this bill careful consideration and had in mind the fact that all these matters had been considered by the Indian Bureau and by the Budget. We have had evidence this afternoon that the Budget does not allow a favorable report on Indian bills with which it has any difference of opinion. But here we have a favorable report from these various sources, and there is the feeling on the part of the committee that it is not just to the Indians under these circumstances to quibble with regard to how this expense is to be met when we are not violating any principle that has not already been established, with one exception, and that is that in order to get a cheaper site for the bridge we go off the reservation about 100 yards. The county takes over the continual expense of maintaining the bridge.

The principal value of the bridge is to the Indians. They do not have access to the school, they do not have proper access to the hospital without this bridge, and we feel their needs are such that the bill should be passed as it has been reported by the committee.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I supported this measure in committee for the reason that we find that there are 4,450 acres of land in this reservation, 32 Indian homes, hospitals, and so forth, thereon that are not taxable in the State of California. Then we find that these people in that sparsely settled country have themselves expended $12,500, confining the river and making it narrower and safe so that it has reduced the cost of this bridge. Then we find again that these Indian children can not attend school as regularly as they ought unless provision is made so that they can get across the river. In view of these facts, and the fact that the land is nontaxable, that the settlers have expended their own funds on the river, we thought that it was nothing more than right for the Government to help build this bridge.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, on page 1, line 3, the words "of $11,000," and insert in line 7, after the word "reservation," the words "and of a road across said reservation."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CRAMTON: On page 1, line 3, strike out the words "of $11,000," and in line 7, after the word "reservation," insert the words "and of a road across said reservation."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, with reference to that amendment, I would have preferred to move to strike out all after the enacting clause, for reasons that I have stated, but to do so would defeat the bill. If the bill is not improved as I suggest I will move to strike out all after the enacting clause; but desiring to go as far as possible along with the views of the gentleman from California the amendment I have suggested would provide that this bridge outside of the reservation up there in the county highway, and the road into the reservation across the Indian lands, both of which will serve not only the Indians but the white settlers, if the county will pay half of the cost of the road across the reservation as it is proposed, and half the cost of the bridge. I hope that the committee and the gentleman from California will accept it.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, the committee has given no consideration to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, and I do not feel that the committee can accept the amendment. We do not know that such a road is necessary for the benefit of the Indians—such a road as is proposed in the amendment by the gentleman from Michigan. It may be that if we accepted the amendment we would be imposing on the Treasury of the United States half the cost of a road not necessary and requiring the State of California to spend money on a road not necessary. That it would cause a delay for another season, and perhaps indefinitely, in the construction of the bridge that is required for the health and the general well-being of the Indians, not only on that reservation but in the surrounding country.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. My amendment does not stipulate what kind of a road it shall be; we are leaving that to the discretion of the Indian Service and the county. Certainly, if the people are to get to the bridge there ought to be some kind of a road to get them there.

Mr. LEAVITT. I understand there is a road sufficient for the Indians to reach the bridge—the bridge is the only problem here.

Mr. CRAMTON. But it is not an improved road—very crude. I do not believe that we should make an expenditure on the bridge, but if we are, then the county ought to be willing to come in and help build the road.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is the distance across the reservation?

Mr. SWING. The reservation consists of 4,450 acres, and the gentleman can judge something about it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, it might be a short distance or it might be a long distance. Is it a mile?

Mr. SWING. It is over a mile. The only thing presented to us is for this bridge, and it would seem to me that with the apparent lack of definite information as to this need for a road, it would be a mistake to write into the bill a provision that would prevent the construction of a bridge until there had been also constructed a road, which may not be even needed.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the opposition of the committee and of the gentleman in charge of the bill to the olive branch extended, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRAMTON) there were—ayes 5, noes 16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BEEDY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15092) to authorize an appropriation to pay half the cost of a bridge near the Soboba Indian Reservation, Calif., and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan demands the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill. Obviously that is impossible.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEAVITT. Does that leave the bill in a position to be called up by the Committee on Indian Affairs at its next day, next week?

The SPEAKER. Yes; when the engrossed copy of the bill will be read.

OSAGE TRIBE OF INDIANS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 16248) for the relief of the Osage Tribe of Indians, and for other purposes, on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the bill H. R. 16248, on the Union Calendar, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $52,469.75, collected on account of lease and other fees at Osage Indian Agency, Okla., and deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts in accordance with the requirements of the act of February 14, 1920 (41 Stat. 415, U. S. C., title 25, sec. 413), is hereby authorized to be appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and to be credited on the books of the Treasury Department to the Indian tribal fund entitled "Proceeds of oil and gas leases, royalties, etc., Osage Reservation, Okla.": Provided, That any additional sums which have been collected at Osage Agency on account of fees under the act referred to but not yet deposited as miscellaneous receipts, shall likewise be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the tribal fund named herein: Provided further, That fees collected hereafter under the said act of February 14, 1920, at any agency where the expenses of selling and leasing Indian lands, marketing the timber on such lands, etc., are paid from Indian tribal funds made available therefor by law, shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of such tribal funds instead of to the credit of miscellaneous receipts, and the said act is hereby amended accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TRESPASSING ON INDIAN LANDS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 13455) to authorize the collection of penalties and fees for stock trespassing on Indian lands, on the Union Calendar, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana calls up the bill H. R. 13455, on the Union Calendar, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person owning or having in his charge or possession any horses, mules, cattle, goats, sheep, or swine, or any such animals, and who permits such stock to range and feed on any restricted lands belonging to any Indian or Indian tribe, or otherwise trespass thereon, without the consent of the superintendent or other officer in charge thereof, shall be liable to a penalty of $1 for each animal of such stock, together with an amount equal to the annual grazing fee therefor in lieu of damages, and the cost of rounding up and caring for the animal and collecting the amount due.

SEC. 2. The superintendent in charge of any Indian or Indian tribe is authorized to seize and hold all stock found on lands under his jurisdiction in violation of the above provision, pending payment of the penalty authorized. Stock not claimed by the owner, after proper advertising, shall be disposed of and the funds derived therefrom handled and disposed of under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, That any funds received from the sale of unclaimed stock in excess of the penalty prescribed shall be held in such manner that any person submitting proof of ownership of any such stock within a period of six months from the date of sale may receive such excess funds derived from the sale of his stock.

SEC. 3. Section 2117, Revised Statutes, is hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 15, after the word "stock," insert a colon and the words: "Provided, That this statute shall not apply to the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes and other Indian lands in the State of Oklahoma."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEAVITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SCHOOL ATTENDANCE ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 15523) authorizing representatives of the several States to make certain inspections and to investigate State sanitary and health regulations and school attendance on Indian reservations, Indian tribal lands, and Indian allotments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana calls up the bill H. R. 15523, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior shall permit the agents and employees of any State to enter upon Indian tribal lands, reservations, or allotments therein for the purpose of making inspection of health and educational conditions and enforcing sanitation and quarantine regulations or to enforce compulsory school attendance of Indian pupils, as provided by the law of the State.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 9, after the word "State," insert "under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEAVITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REINVESTING TITLE TO CERTAIN LANDS, YANKTON SIOUX TRIBE OF INDIANS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 2792 on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2792) reinvesting title to certain lands in the Yankton Sioux Tribe of Indians

Be it enacted, etc., That all claim, right, title, and interest in and to certain lands on the Yankton Sioux Indian Reservation in the State of South Dakota, now reserved for agency, schools, and other purposes (embracing 1,000 acres, more or less), pursuant to the act of Congress dated August 15, 1894 (28 Stat. 286), be, and is hereby, reinvested in the Yankton Sioux Tribe of Indians subject to the continued use of such lands for agency, schools, and other purposes, until they are no longer required for such purposes: Provided, however, That this act shall not be construed to make any such land available for allotment purposes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Montana yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield such time as the gentleman may desire.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take much time, but I do think the attention of the House ought to be called to what this bill does. Personally, I do not see any justification for this bill. It is opposed, as disclosed from the report and from the report of the department, apparently on good grounds. It is a bill to reinvest title in certain lands in the Yankton Sioux Tribe of Indians. There is no compensation to the Federal Government. There is no consideration for the revesting. There is no showing of any reason to justify it. Now the report of the department is as follows:

The land mentioned consists of approximately 800 acres and is a part of the area ceded and sold to the United States by the Yankton Tribe under the act of April 15, 1894 (28 Stat. 286–319), but reserved by this department August 27, 1894, for school and agency purposes.

We bought these lands from these Indians and then set them aside to be used for school and agency purposes for the benefit of these Indians, and the Government furnished the money to carry on the agency and the school. Now, a little further:

There are 40 buildings on the land used in connection with school and administrative activities, the land and buildings being valued at about $50,000.

These buildings were constructed, I might say, at the expense of the Federal Government. They are going to be operated by the Federal Government, at the expense of the Federal Government, for the benefit of these Indians. Then, down farther:

The lands ceded and sold by the Indians to the United States, excepting that reserved for certain purposes, were immediately opened to homestead entry at $3.75 per acre, which represented their value at that time.

I will say I am not concerned about the $3.75 an acre paid these. I would not worry about the $3.75 an acre; but the department says further:

However, it is not believed that a reconveyance is advisable. It would be a step backwards, in that it would necessarily limit the jurisdiction of the Federal Government over the reserved area and bring about some undesirable conditions that could not be readily controlled. For the reasons given, it is recommended that S. 2792 be not enacted into law. The Director of the Bureau of the Budget advises that the proposed legislation is in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Now I have so much confidence in the Committee on Indian Affairs that I do not understand how this bill got out of that committee. Here is what it does. It takes land which we bought from these Indians and paid for and which we have improved with buildings which we are using for the benefit of those Indians, and we are divesting ourselves of jurisdiction over certain lands where we still want to use the land for the benefit of those Indians. The Government says it limits jurisdiction and brings about a certain undesirable condition that could not be readily controlled. The introduction of the automobile and the building of good roads has increased greatly the difficulty of administering law and order on these reservations, and in little communities that are established about the agency, including trading posts, and so forth, they have enough trouble to guard against the establishment of bootlegging joints and other undesirable things around in the reservation.

We ought not to lessen the authority of the department over that area. We ought not to weaken their power to regulate the situation. There is no showing whatever that this results in any particular benefit to the Indians. There is nothing in the report of the committee, nothing in the report of the department, to indicate that the Indians are particularly benefited, because we still continue to operate our agency and other activities there. But we do not have the authority over the situation, if this bill becomes a law, that we have now.

I hope that this is one bill that the committee will not agree to.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON] 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] has made a very forceful and effective argument, but the great part of it is wholly aside, to my mind, from the facts in regard to the measure. The Indians are asking for the return of this land to them when the Government ceases to use this land for school purposes. That is all there is involved in it. It is a question whether we will let these lands revert to the Indians when that time comes. Under the proposed law nothing is taken from the Government. This is only giving back to the Indians something we have taken from them in the past.

The argument that the gentleman from Michigan makes, that this will embarrass the administration of affairs down there, is not convincing. I can not see that it will in any way change the authority of the Government over this reservation in the east. This law does not become effective, if it passes, until the Government ceases the operation of its schools down there, and then the land reverts back to the Indians. Until that time the Government will have the full jurisdiction over these lands that it has now.

Mr. CRAMTON. The bill becomes effective as soon as it becomes a law, as soon as it is signed by the President, because it says, "Is hereby reinvested in the Yankton Sioux Tribe of Indians, subject to the continued use of such lands for agency, schools, and other purposes." That is giving to the Government, after this becomes a law, a less control than it has now.

If it is agreeable to the gentleman, I would suggest an amendment, which would accomplish what the gentleman from South Dakota is working for, and that amendment is to strike out lines 10, 11, and 12, and change them so that the bill will read this way:

Be, and is hereby, reinvested in the Yankton Sioux Tribe of Indians when they are no longer required for agency, school, or other purposes.

To that I will have no objection.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I have no objection to that. It is not my intention in this bill to deprive the Government of any supervision or regulation over this land while the Government continues to occupy the same.

Mr. CRAMTON. That will accomplish what is desired.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I have no objection.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, the entire purpose of the bill will not be changed, so far as the Committee on Indian Affairs is informed, by accepting that amendment. The delegation of Indians who appeared before the committee presented their desire that whenever these lands ceased to be needed for the purposes they are used for they should be passed back to the custody of the tribe for a community center. That is what they want. Until the Government is through with this land the Government shall be the owner of it. The proposed amendment would not change the character of the bill materially at all.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some time.

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the reason why I am taking the floor is to bring to the attention of the House that part of the report which is very illuminating, found in the last two lines, which says:

The Director of the Bureau of the Budget advises that the proposed legislation is in conflict with the financial program of the President.

If I had my way about it, whenever such a report as that came to the committee, by direction of the committee I would return it, because it gives no information. It does not show the proper respect for the committee. It does not give any reasons why the Bureau of the Budget opposes it. It does not give any reasons as to why it is against the financial program of the President. In fact, there is no information in it at all.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly.

Mr. LEAVITT. In this case, of course, the gentleman will recognize that the committee did not accept that as a reason for not reporting the bill favorably.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am glad the committee did not. I rose to call the attention of the House—and I hope it will go beyond the House to the country—to the fact that that last clause found in the report conveys no information whatever. If the Bureau of the Budget wants to influence the committee, it should impart the facts upon which an adverse report is made for the benefit of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Can the gentleman site any such remark or report by the Budget Bureau upon any other bill as to the reason?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes. That is why I rise now. I want to call the attention of the House to this criticism not relating alone to this particular bill but similar language is used in many reports on other bills. I trust that hereafter committees receiving that kind of a statement in a report will return it for more definite information.

Mr. ARENTZ. The gentleman has in mind that there should be a different wording in the report of the Budget officer as to a bill containing an appropriation and a bill not containing an appropriation?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes. I think the Budget Bureau, in making an adverse report on a bill, should give its reasons why.

Mr. ARENTZ. But if the bill contains no appropriation and has nothing to do with the expenditure of money, it certainly has not anything to do with the Budget, and if the Budget expresses an opinion upon such a piece of legislation it is merely expressing a policy that should under no circumstances come from the Budget. That is the point I had in mind.

Mr. HASTINGS. I heartily agree with the gentleman. No appropriation is carried here. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: On page 1, strike out lines 10, 11, and 12, down to and including the word "purposes" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "When they are no longer required for agency, school, and other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEAVITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RAYBURN, OF TEXAS

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am not one of those who believes that every magazine article, however much it strikes our fancy, should be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and rarely do I ask permission to print.

It was my privilege, however, to read a few days ago an article in a new magazine, Bunker's Monthly, the Magazine of Texas, published in the city of Fort Worth, a most interesting article entitled "RAYBURN, of Texas." This article was written by Dr. Walter Splawn, a former president of the University of Texas, and a transportation expert of nation-wide reputation. It refers especially to the services of our distinguished colleague of Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], who has served on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee for many years, and with great distinction. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has amongst its membership very able men, both Republicans and Democrats, but none of them has performed more constructive service than Mr. RAYBURN.

I am sure the Membership of the House appreciate and concur in the high estimate that Doctor Splawn places upon the service Congressman RAYBURN has rendered to his State and his country. I feel that this recognition by so eminent an authority of public service of our colleague should be a part of the permanent records of the Congress. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing this article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. [Applause.]

The matter referred to is as follows:

RAYBURN, OF TEXAS—AN ESTIMATE OF THE WORK OF THE RANKING MEMBER OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE

By Walter Splawn, transportation economist and former president of the University of Texas

In making a study of transportation problems one finds the record of hearings of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to be indispensable. If one attends the hearings of these committees one is impressed by the difference between the methods of the Senate and of the House. Only on exceptional occasions are all members of the Senate committee in attendance. Quite frequently not more than half a dozen—perhaps only 2 or 3 members—out of a total of 19 are present. On the other hand, it is very exceptional not to find a majority of the House committee present at any one of its meetings. In fact, the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has an exceptional record for devotion to its work. It is quite common to find every member of the committee not only present but alert and taking an active and intelligent interest in the proceedings. This committee has made an enviable reputation for assiduity, thoroughness, fairness, and devotion to the public interest.

The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has jurisdiction over bills pertaining to the public health; aids to navigation, such as establishing and maintaining lighthouses; guarding the coast, being the work formerly included under the divisions of safety and revenue cutters; bridges over navigable streams; the Panama Canal; the barges, such as the Black Warrior; telephone and telegraph; and now they are confronted with demand for regulation of busses and motor trucks engaged in interstate commerce. From this list of important subjects of legislation one is able to see how the work of the committee again and again touches the lives and affects the well-being of every man, woman, and child in the entire United States. The questions considered are so varied and frequently so complicated that they may be competently handled only by men who have served for years and who have had time to master these important and rather difficult fields of legislation. In selecting members of this committee the House ordinarily picks men from districts with a reputation for returning their Members indefinitely. A district fortunate enough to secure a place on this committee usually wins a preeminence and leadership in the House that is really enviable. Again and again this committee furnishes the country with eminent and trusted leaders. Such men are developed through years of application to the weighty questions presented to the committee in grappling with problems that are continually arising in this active and progressive Nation.

It should be a source of pride to every Texan that the ranking Democrat on the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is a member of the Texas delegation. Hon. SAM RAYBURN, of Bonham, Tex., entered Congress in 1913 and at the special session called by President Wilson he was, on June 3 of that year, appointed a member of this powerful committee. During 15 years he has sat in the councils of a committee that has dealt with the most perplexing and most important questions of transportation that have ever been presented to the American Congress.

During the first six years of the Wilson administration the Democrats were in power, and as a member of the majority of the committee he helped to shape legislation which made the interstate act to regulate commerce a more workable law, and he helped to fashion the measure under which the railroads were made to serve the greatest interests of the Nation during the trying years of the World War.

During the war this committee had jurisdiction over bills concerning war risks, soldiers' compensation, and insurance. The Wilson administration earned the gratitude of the country for the enlightened manner in which these questions were met.

SAM RAYBURN handled that body of legislation on the floor of the House. He was the author of an amendment which made the initial carrier liable to the shipper for the safe transport of goods through to destination, though lines in other States and jurisdiction might participate in the movement. This relieved the shipper from the burden of locating just which railroad had damaged his goods, and prevented a game of hide and seek among railroads engaged in a joint haul of goods which happened to suffer damage in transit. RAYBURN was a member of the subcommittee which drew the statute creating the Federal Trade Commission.

Texas was a pioneer in regulating the issuing of stocks and bonds by railroads. RAYBURN, before being sent to Congress, had been a speaker of the Texas House of Representatives. He was familiar with the benefits of the Texas law regulating railway securities. Before the war he passed through the House a bill similar to the Texas statute. It was defeated in the Senate. In 1920 the Rayburn bill was accepted, and practically without change it was written into the transportation act of 1920 and is now a Federal law. Under the leadership of Reagan and Hogg, Texas regulated railway securities. Under the leadership of RAYBURN, of Texas, the Federal Government adopted the Texas policy.

Since the war, though the Republicans have been in the majority on the committee, Mr. RAYBURN'S work has been of such high order that he has won nation-wide recognition. In recent years much of his time has been taken up with preventing undesirable legislation. Year after year he has patiently gone through thousands of pages of testimony, has listened to witnesses representing every interest, and has carefully brought to light in each case the distinction between the public interest and the selfish interest of some group.

American civilization is dependent upon transportation facilities. Without the railroads vast stretches of our country could not have been settled. Without the railroads our commerce, industries, mining, and agriculture could not have developed as we know them to-day. America boasts of the best railroad transportation system in the world, and the American Government is leading the world in the regulation of privately owned and operated railroads. The fairness and justice with which these roads are regulated and with which they serve the public is largely dependent upon the temper of congressional action. The people of Texas may well rejoice that a son of our State should be a leader in determining governmental policies with reference to transportation, and that he has worked with such wisdom that even those who may not agree with him concede his fairness, his ability, his devotion to the public interest, and his courage.

Mr. RAYBURN is now ranking Democrat on the committee, having reached that eminence during the Sixty-ninth Congress. If the Democrats control the next House of Representatives, he will be the chairman of the committee. That will mean that Texas will have one of the most important chairmanships in the entire Congress.

Texas has been active in the field of railway legislation and regulation. It was Senator Reagan who was a pioneer of the act to regulate commerce. It was he who had the patriotism to resign a seat in the United States Senate in order to set up the work of the Texas Railroad Commission. On the Texas Railroad Commission the late Allison Mayfield served many years with great distinction, and by reason of his long tenure and unusual fairness and capacity won a national reputation and brought great prestige to the Texas commission. The mantle of Reagan and Allison Mayfield has fallen upon SAM RAYBURN, who is the ranking Democrat on the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and who through his services is bringing to Texas the same high order of recognition that was first won in earlier years by John H. Reagan and Allison Mayfield.

NIOBRARA ISLAND

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate bill 4979, to authorize the city of Niobrara, Nebr., to transfer Niobrara Island to the State of Nebraska.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of the United States is hereby granted to the city of Niobrara, Nebr., to transfer to the State of Nebraska all the rights, title, and interest of such city in and to Niobrara Island, an island in the Niobrara River, if the State of Nebraska, before the expiration of five years from the date of the enactment of this act, formerly accepts such island subject to the same conditions (except the condition as to time of acceptance) as are imposed by section 21 of the act entitled "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889, in respect of the donation to the city of Niobrara of such island.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEAVITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

OSAGE INDIANS IN OKLAHOMA

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate bill 2360, to amend section 1 of the act of Congress of March 3, 1921 (41 Stat. L. p. 1249), entitled "An act to amend section 3 of the act of Congress of June 28, 1906, entitled 'An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma, and for other purposes.'"

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana calls up a Senate bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the Act of Congress approved March 3, 1921 (41 Stat. L. 1249), entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma, and for other purposes," be amended by adding after the last line of said section 1 the following:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may reduce the area to be offered annually hereunder, or suspend the offer of leases for not exceeding two years at any one time when, in his opinion, an overproduction of oil, or inadequate prices therefor, make such extension or suspension desirable in the interests of the Osage Nation, the entire unleased area, however, to be offered for lease not later than April 8, 1936."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, beginning in line 3, strike out all of lines 3 to 7, and all of lines 1 to 8, inclusive, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That section 1 of the act of Congress of March 3, 1921 (41 Stat. L. 1249), relating to the Osage Indians of Oklahoma, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That all that part of the act of June 28, 1906 (34 Stat. L. 539), entitled 'An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma, and for other purposes,' which reserves to the Osage Tribe the oil, gas, coal, or other minerals, covered by the lands for the selection and division of which provision is made in that act is hereby amended so that the oil, gas, coal, or other minerals, covered by said lands are reserved to the Osage Tribe, until the 8th day of April, 1958, and as long thereafter as oil, or gas, or other minerals are found in paying quantities, and all royalties and bonuses arising therefrom shall belong to the Osage Tribe of Indians, and shall be disbursed to members of the Osage Tribe or their heirs or assigns as now provided by law, after reserving such amounts as are now or may hereafter be authorized by Congress for specific purposes, and the lands, moneys, and other properties now held in trust or under the supervision of the United States for the Osage Tribe of Indians, the members thereof, or their heirs and assigns shall continue subject to such trust and supervision until January 1, 1959, unless otherwise provided by act of Congress. The Secretary of the Interior and the Osage tribal council are hereby authorized and directed to offer for lease for oil, gas, and other mining purposes any unleased portion of said land in such quantities and at such times as may be deemed for the best interest of the Osage Tribe of Indians: Provided, That not less than 25,000 acres shall be offered for lease for oil and gas mining purposes during any one year: Provided further, That as to all lands hereafter leased, the regulations governing same and the leases issued thereon shall contain appropriate provisions for the conservation of the natural gas for its economic use, to the end that the highest percentage of ultimate recovery of both oil and gas may be secured: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting any valid existing lease for oil or gas or other minerals.

"Homestead allotments shall remain exempt from taxation while the title remains in the allottee or in his unallotted heirs or devisees of one-half degree or more of Osage Indian blood until January 1, 1959: Provided, That the tax-exempt land of any such Indian allottee, heir, or devisee shall not at any time exceed 160 acres.

"SEC. 2. That section 2 of the act of March 3, 1921 (41 Stat. L. 1249), entitled 'An act to amend section 3 of the act of Congress of June 28, 1906, entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma, and for other purposes,"' be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'The bona fide owner, lessee, or occupant of the surface of lands in the Osage Nation in Oklahoma shall be compensated, as his interest may appear, and under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for damages to crops and improvements occasioned by the oil or gas lessees, their servants, or agents in going upon such premises and in carrying on oil or gas mining operations. Such surface owner, lessee, or occupant shall also be compensated, as his interest may appear, and under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, for such other damages, including those arising out of pollution of ponds or streams and out of injuries to the surface of lands, as are caused by the negligence of the oil or gas lessees, their servants, or agents in developing or operating oil or gas properties in said Osage Nation. The word "negligence" as used in this act shall mean "negligence" as defined and construed by the courts of the State of Oklahoma. All claims for damages arising under this section shall be settled by arbitration; but either party shall have the right to appeal to the courts, without consent of the Secretary of the Interior, in the event he is dissatisfied with the award to or against him. The award shall be in writing and shall be filed in the office of the superintendent of the Osage Indian Agency within 10 days after it is made, and thereupon the said superintendent shall give the parties written notice thereof by personal service or registered mail. Unless appealed from within 60 days after service or mailing of said notice, the award shall become final. The appeal herein authorized shall consist of filing an original action in any court of competent jurisdiction sitting at the county seat of Osage County, to enlarge, modify, or set aside the award; and in any such action, upon demand of either party, the issues both of law and of fact shall be tried de novo. Arbitration or a bona fide offer in writing to arbitrate shall constitute conditions precedent to the right to sue for such damages.'

"SEC. 3. That section 1 of the act of Congress of February 27, 1925 (43 Stat. L. 1008), is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"'The Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, upon application of any member of the Osage Tribe of Indians not having a certificate of competency, to pay all or any part of the funds held in trust for such Indian: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall, within one year after this act is approved, pay to each enrolled Indian of less than half Osage blood, one-fifth part of his or her proportionate trust-fund credit. And such Secretary shall on or before the expiration of 10 years from the date of the approval of this act, advance and pay over to such Osage Indian of less than one-half Osage Indian blood, all of the balance appearing to his credit in the Osage tribal trust fund and shall issue to such Indian a certificate of competency: Provided further, That when and where any Osage Indian of less than half Osage Indian blood shall owe debts and obligations for necessaries of life, then and in that event the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to retain from and not pay out to such Osage Indian debtor 25 per cent of his quarterly dues, to be by the Secretary of the Interior paid in installments upon the now existing claims against such Indian for necessaries of life, such as medicines, doctor bills, food, clothing, dry goods, and for implements and other materials required in the operation of the Indian's farm lands, against which claims the statute of limitations of Oklahoma has not run. But no money shall be retained out of the quarterly allowances due such Osage Indians, by the Secretary of the Interior for any other purpose, without the consent and approval of such Indians. The Secretary of the Interior shall determine such rules and regulations for the payment of said retained moneys of said Osage Indians, upon such meritorious claims for necessaries of life against which claims the statute of limitations of Oklahoma has not run. But the provisions herein made for payment of debts shall only apply to present existing meritorious claims against which the statute of limitations of Oklahoma has not run: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall by or before the end of five years from the date of the approval of this act, pay to each restricted Osage Indian of less than half Osage blood who is not incompetent under the laws of the State of Oklahoma, and who is at the date of approval of this act more than 25 years of age, the whole of his or her pro rata share of the tribal trust fund then being to the credit of such Indian: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall, in his discretion, pay any present existing meritorious debts and obligations of any restricted Osage Indian, against which debts and claims the statute of limitations of Oklahoma has not run, out of any moneys appearing to the credit of such Osage Indian in the tribal trust fund: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to interfere in any way with the removal by the Secretary of the Interior of restrictions from and against any Osage Indian at any time.'

"SEC. 4. That section 2 of the act of Congress approved February 27, 1925 (43 Stat. L. 1011), being an act to amend the act of Congress of March 3, 1921 (41 Stat. L. 1249), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'Upon the death of an Osage Indian of one-half or more Indian blood who does not have a certificate of competency, his or her moneys and funds and other property accrued and accruing to his or her credit and which have heretofore been subject to supervision as provided by law shall be paid to the administrator or executor of the estate of such deceased Indian or direct to his heirs or devisees, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, under regulations to be promulgated by him: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall pay to administrators and executors of the estates of such deceased Osage Indians a sufficient amount of money out of such estates to pay all lawful indebtedness and costs and expenses of administration when approved by him; and, out of the shares belonging to heirs or devisees, above referred to, he shall pay the costs and expenses of such heirs or devisees, including attorney fees, when approved by him, in the determination of heirs or contest of wills. Upon the death of any Osage Indian of less than one-half degree of Osage Indian blood or upon the death of an Osage Indian who has a certificate of competency, his moneys and funds and other property accrued and accruing to his credit shall be paid and delivered to the administrator or executor of his estate to be administered upon according to the laws of the State of Oklahoma: Provided, That upon the settlement of such estate any funds or property subject to the control or supervision of the Secretary of the Interior on the date of the approval of this act, which have been inherited by or devised to any adult or minor heir or devisee of one-half or more Osage Indian blood who does not have a certificate of competency, and which have been paid or delivered by the Secretary of the Interior to the administrator or executor shall be paid or delivered by such administrator or executor to the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of such Indian and shall be subject to the supervision of the Secretary as provided by law.'

"SEC. 5. The restrictions concerning lands and funds of allotted Osage Indians, as provided in this act and all prior acts now in force, shall apply only to unallotted Osage Indians of one-half or more Osage Indian blood born since July 1, 1907, or after the passage of this act, and to their heirs of one-half or more Osage Indian blood, except that the provisions of section 6 of the act of Congress approved February 27, 1925, with reference to the validity of contracts for debt, shall not apply to any allotted or unallotted Osage Indian of less than one-half degree Indian blood: Provided, That the Osage lands and funds and any other property which has heretofore or which may hereafter be held in trust or under supervision of the United States for such Osage Indians of less than one-half degree Indian blood not having a certificate of competency shall not be subject to forced sale to satisfy any debt or obligation contracted or incurred prior to the issuance of a certificate of competency: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to grant a certificate of competency to any unallotted Osage Indian when in the judgment of the said Secretary such member is fully competent and capable of transacting his or her own affairs.

"SEC. 6. The first provision of section 1 of the act of February 27, 1925 (43 Stat. L. 1008), entitled 'An act to amend the act of Congress of March 3, 1921, entitled "An act to amend section 3 of the act of Congress of June 28, 1906, entitled 'An act of Congress for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma, and for other purposes,'"' is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be paid at the end of each fiscal quarter to each adult member of the Osage Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma having a certificate of competency his or her pro rata share, either as a member of the tribe or heir or devisee of a deceased member, of the interest on trust funds, the bonus received from the sale of oil or gas leases, the royalties therefrom, and any other moneys due such Indian received during each fiscal quarter, including all moneys received prior to the passage of this act and remaining unpaid; and so long as the accumulated income is sufficient the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be paid to the adult members of said tribe not having a certificate of competency $1,500 quarterly, except where such adult members have legal guardians, in which case the amounts provided for herein may be paid to the legal guardian or direct to such Indian, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior; the total amounts of such payments, however, shall not exceed $1,500 quarterly, except as hereinafter provided; and shall cause to be paid for the maintenance and education, to either one of the parents or legal guardians actually having personally in charge, enrolled or unenrolled, minor member under 21 years of age and above 18 years of age, $1,500 quarterly out of the income of each of said minors, and out of the income of minors under 18 years of age $750 quarterly, and so long as the accumulated income of the parent or parents of a minor who has no income or whose income is less than $750 per quarter is sufficient shall cause to be paid to either of said parents having the care and custody of such minor $750 quarterly, or such proportion thereof as the income of such minor may be less than $750, in addition to the allowances above provided for such parents. Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, before the bill is taken up for amendment I would be glad to have a little time on the bill in a general way, if I can get recognition or if the gentleman from Montana will yield me some time.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to yield the gentleman such time as he desires.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, is this bill being considered in the House?

The SPEAKER. It is a House Calendar bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Under the rules, is the time in the control of the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. CRAMTON. The first hour is. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, we have now reached a bill of great importance, affecting the welfare, financially and otherwise, of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma, probably the wealthiest Indians in the country.

Their lands have never been allotted so far as the mineral rights are concerned, with the result that upon the development of great quantities of oil upon the lands they have become extremely wealthy as a tribe, the oil receipts being apportioned among the members of the tribe.

The Indians of the country, let me say for the information of those who are perhaps not familiar with Indian matters, are divided into two classes—those who are restricted and those who are not restricted. That is one classification, and it is one of much importance to consider in connection with this bill. The restricted Indians are wards of the Government. We have charge of their financial and property affairs. They can not sell their lands without the consent of the Government. We have control of their affairs, and that control is based upon the theory that they are not competent to properly manage their own affairs.

Now, occasionally the cry goes up that there is bureaucratic control of these poor Indians; that they are held in bondage; and that we ought to turn them loose. Occasionally, some very well-meaning people subscribe to that theory. The Hon. Franklin K. Lane, a splendid gentleman and a great Secretary of the Interior, was prevailed upon to go quite a way in removing restrictions on Indians, with the result that those Indians, as soon as they were given the right to sell their lands, did sell them and wasted the receipts and then were paupers. Now, strictly speaking, when they have reached that state the responsibility of the Federal Government has ceased, and it ought to be up to the State to take care of those paupers just as they would take care of any white paupers.

It has always been my theory that the desire of the American people is to go a long way in caring for Indians, even if those restrictions have been removed and they have thereafter become pauperized.

If any such theory as that is entertained, of course, not only out of regard for the welfare of the Indians, but out of regard for the welfare of the Treasury, we ought to be rather cautious about removing restrictions unless they are competent.

I have no criticism of the immediate purpose of the bill. The immediate purpose is set forth in the first section of the committee amendment on pages 2 and 3; that is to say, to extend the control of the Government over these minerals to 1958. There are, however, some things embodied in the bill that surprise me very much, that I think are dangerous, and that this committee ought not to approve.

I have some minor amendments to suggest at different parts of the bill, but at this time I am not going to take time to discuss them. I do want to discuss section 3 of the committee amendment on page 6, which provides that "The Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, upon application of any member of the Osage Tribe of Indians not having a certificate of competency"—that is to say, his restriction has not been removed—"to pay all or any part of the funds held in trust for such Indian"—that is to say, certain Indians who have large amounts of money to their credit will not be permitted to sell their land because we hold they are not competent, but we do propose to let the Secretary of the Interior turn all their money over to them without reserve.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Is it not the fact that the law mentioned in the first part of section 3 is the present law, and has been for a number of years?

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, that may be true as to this particular provision, but the law is before us and it is a very good time to change it, in my judgment.

I am just going on from that to a provision that is not in the present law and that I think is very undesirable:

Provided further, That when and where any Osage Indian of less than half Osage Indian blood shall owe debts and obligations for necessaries of life, then and in that event the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to retain from and not pay out to such Osage Indian debtor 25 per cent of his quarterly dues, to be by the Secretary of the Interior paid in installments upon the now existing claims against such Indian for necessaries of life, such as medicines, doctor bills, food, clothing, dry goods, and for implements and other materials required in the operation of the Indian's farm lands, against which claims the statute of limitations of Oklahoma has not run.

I am reading it as the committee proposes to amend it.

But no money shall be retained out of the quarterly allowances due such Osage Indians, by the Secretary of the Interior for any other purpose, without the consent and approval of such Indians.

Then it goes on to say:

And provided further, That said 25 per cent of payments due said Osage Indians of less than half Indian blood, shall not be retained unless and until claims for the aforesaid necessaries of life have been presented to, investigated, and approved by the superintendent of the Osage Agency.

That is to say, here are some Indians who are to be held competent to spend their money and the money is to be turned over to them, some of them not restricted even as to the sale of their lands, and having less than one-half of Indian blood, but we are going to set up in the Interior Department a collection agency as against these Indians. These Indians are scattered all over the country. They are not all in Oklahoma. There may be one somewhere in Idaho. We have got to get in touch with that Indian and say, "Here is a doctor bill rendered against you. Under the law we hold you are competent to incur a debt, you are competent to take your money, amounting to several thousand dollars a year, and spend it as you want, but this doctor bill has got to be paid, if it is just," and we put on the superintendent of the Osage Agency, down in Oklahoma, the responsibility of reaching up into Idaho and asking that Indian what he thinks about this doctor bill that has been filed or this bill for food or dry goods, or whatever it may be.

We propose to put on that superintendent in Oklahoma the burden and the expense of adjusting these claims against these Indians.

In my judgment, this bill is not properly on the House Calendar. I think it ought to have been on the Union Calendar, because it does involve a necessary charge upon the Federal Government with respect to the settlement of these claims.

Now, the Indians naturally are not keen about this amendment and this provision that the committee has adopted.

I am just trying to go through this a little hurriedly in order to bring these things to the attention of the House. These matters that I am speaking of are not essential to the main purpose of the bill. That would be accomplished if section 1 was put through, granting the extension. These are things that are not necessary to accomplish that purpose.

Let me show you something on page 7, and I am not sure just how much of this is old law and how much is new. My time has not permitted me to make the further comparison I would like, but I understand that this provision on page 7 that I am about to read, the proviso beginning on line 15, is not in accordance with present law. The proviso reads:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall, by or before the end of five years from the date of the approval of this act, pay to each restricted Osage Indian of less than half Osage blood who is not incompetent under the laws of the State of Oklahoma, and who is at the date of approval of this act more than 25 years of age, the whole of his or her pro rata share of the tribal trust fund then being to the credit of such Indian.

That is to say, having provided in section 1 that these Indians are lacking in competency for handling their own affairs, hence we are going to extend the restriction period to 1958 or 1959; but notwithstanding that lack of competency, the Secretary of the Interior shall within five years turn over this great cash capital to them, which is worth more than any lands they have.

Mr. LEAVITT. I understood the gentleman to use the word "competent" in the bill where it reads "incompetent."

Mr. CRAMTON. The word "incompetent" in line 19 does not have to do with the question of competency as applied to the Indians under the Federal law, but incompetency there is under the State laws of Oklahoma, whether the Indian is insane or feeble-minded.

Mr. LEAVITT. I understood the gentleman to use the word "competent."

Mr. CRAMTON. I thank the gentleman. We hold his rights may be restricted for the next 30 years.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I think the gentleman must be mistaken.

Mr. CRAMTON. Very possibly; I am willing to be corrected.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The purpose is to extend the period of communal or tribal interest in the mineral rights.

Mr. CRAMTON. How about the individual Indian restrictions?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. There is none; except perhaps——

Mr. CRAMTON. What does line 18 mean when it says: "pay to each restricted Osage Indian of less than half Osage blood who is not incompetent under the laws of the State of Oklahoma"?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. He is restricted for a period of 10 years. The bill provides that less than a half blood are to be emancipated completely within the period of 10 years.

Mr. CRAMTON. I confess I have not had the time to make a thorough and complete study of the subject. I have taken the floor to point these things out. If I am right I hope the bill will be corrected; if I am wrong I wish to be corrected. Under the statement of the gentleman from Kansas it appears that we hold their restriction for 10 years and within five years—on or before, it may possibly be next year—we turn all their cash over to them. That seems to me to be not consistent.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I do not think the gentleman understands.

Mr. CRAMTON. The bill says:

The Secretary of the Interior shall by or before the end of five years pay to each restricted Osage Indian of less than half Osage blood who is not incompetent under the laws of the State of Oklahoma—

And so forth—

the whole of his or her pro rata share of the tribal trust fund then being to the credit of such Indian.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Referring to the matter of restriction, at the Osage Agency they are held to be Indians who have not been issued certificates of competency by the Secretary of the Interior. The Indians referred to are less than one-half Indian blood, and there are not quite 100 of them. These are young Indians which range from one-sixty-fourth degree of blood up to not quite one-half Indian blood. Practically every one of them is a graduate from our largest colleges. Several of them have graduated from colleges in Vermont and New Hampshire, and some of them have graduated from Yale and Harvard and Oklahoma University. As a matter of fact, they are as competent as you or I, except their certificates of competency have not been issued.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman state what is the effect of the failure to issue a certificate of competency, as far as paying taxes is concerned and so far as their authority to do business?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The effect, as far as doing business is concerned, is that they can not do any business in their own name. They are issued a thousand dollars every three months, and their homesteads are tax exempt.

What we are seeking to do is this: There is a continual effort to get the restrictions removed on these less than half bloods. From time to time they have been removed and will continue to be removed. We are seeking to pay them only one-fifth of their money at this time and continue for 10 years before we turn them loose.

Mr. CRAMTON. What does the gentleman say to this language:

The Secretary shall, on or before the end of five years from the date of this act, pay to each of such Indians the whole of his or her pro rata share of the tribal trust fund then being to the credit of such Indians.

There is no deferring that for 10 years.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. That is for the Indians of more than 25 years of age.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The provision means that if they are more than 25 years of age it is the intention to within 5 years pay them off, but if they are under 25 years then to take 10 years.

Mr. CRAMTON. Here is my position, and I am challenging the attention of the committee to this, because I have great confidence in what the committee wants to do. Either those Indians are competent to handle their business affairs or they are not. When we come to the point where we can declare that they are competent to handle their business affairs and turn the money over to them and give them a certificate of competency, we should do so, but we ought not to say that they are not to have that certificate of competency for 10 years but that their whole capital may be turned over to them to be used as they like to-morrow.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Our intention in this bill is to pay them as we suggest and to try, as we turn their money over to them, to give them a chance for a business training and not permit them to have all of their money at once, and perhaps get rid of it, which has been the case.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is no restriction here to gradual payment. It is said that experience is a dear teacher. You require the Secretary to turn all their cash capital over to them to-morrow or before five years, and if they waste it they may get a business training, but it will be expensive.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will refer back to page 6, line 9, he will find the following language:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall, within one year after this act is approved, pay to each enrolled Indian of less than half Osage blood, one-fifth part of his or her proportionate trust-fund credit. And such Secretary shall on or before the expiration of 10 years from the date of the approval of this act, advance and pay over to such Osage Indian of less than one-half Osage Indian blood, all of the balance appearing to his credit in the Osage tribal trust fund and shall issue to such Indian a certificate of competency.

We are seeking by that provision to emancipate those Indians that are, as I say, running from one sixty-fourth blood up to almost half blood; Indians that are graduates of our colleges and schools, and except for the way in which we have been handling them and their business they would have been more capable of handling their business than they now are.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not want to get away from the point that I am making, and I shall try to make that point now. I feel that with such an important bill it would be helpful if the committee would take this back and check over these provisions that are either obscure or contradictory. I gave this some study; not as much as I would like, I am frank to admit, and I was not able in the time I had to untangle this proposition. The gentleman from Oklahoma has just referred to the language on page 6 which provides that the Secretary shall within one year pay to each enrolled Indian of less than half Osage blood, one-fifth part and within 10 years advance all of his balance. That is one provision. I was not sure when I read that, when it said "To each enrolled Indian," whether that was intended to refer to those restricted or unrestricted, or to just limit it to one class. I was not sure what was covered by that. Set over against that definite provision of the annual payment of one-tenth of their capital for the next 10 years to those less than half-blood, this provision on the next page that requires the Secretary within five years to pay to each restricted Osage Indian all his capital. Those provisions are in conflict, unless the one on page 7 refers to restricted Indians of a certain age, and the one on page 6 refers to those not restricted. If so, the provisions would not be in conflict, but it is hard to be sure of that from the language. In connection with it there is one other provision. I think the committee ought to study out the different angles of this and round it up a little more substantially than has yet been done. At the bottom of page 3 there is a provision to which the gentleman from Oklahoma referred and which I noticed in my study of the bill. It refers to homestead allotments. That is to say, each of these Indians will have 160 acres as a homestead, and the balance of their lands are not exempt from taxation, even though the Indian may be a restricted Indian. His land holdings beyond 160 acres are subject to taxation in Oklahoma.

Now this provision is that the 160 acres—shall remain exempt from taxation while the title remains in the allottee or in his unallotted heirs or devisees of one-half degree or more of Osage Indian blood until January 1, 1959: Provided, that the tax-exempt land of any such Indian allottee, heir, or devisee shall not at any time exceed 160 acres.

That is to say these Indians are so fully competent, as the gentleman from Oklahoma insists, that we are going to turn a tremendous amount of cash capital over to them within the next few years for them to squander as they like, but this 160 acres they may not sell until 1959, unless they are given a certificate of competency in advance of that time, and for the next 30 years it is to be exempt from taxation. Now, again I say either these Indians are competent to handle their business affairs or they are not competent. If they are competent to handle their business affairs, turn over their cash and put them on the same basis as any other citizen of Oklahoma, including the privilege of paying taxes. If they are not competent and hence can not sell this land, can not be permitted to pay taxes, do not turn over to them hundreds of thousands of dollars of cash capital within the next few years for them to squander.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will yield, I will say to the gentleman this exemption of 160 acres to them is a gratuity on the part of Oklahoma. We have in every tribe this same condition existing; restricted Indians have homesteads exempt from taxation and surplus lands that are taxable.

Mr. CRAMTON. Now, the State of Oklahoma seems to be extremely generous in this. It is exceedingly agreeable that we exempt these lands from taxation for 30 years, although we are now insisting these Indians are competent to handle their business affairs. What is the situation? Why, the Indian—he wants to get his hands on the cash.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. In just a moment. He wants that cash as soon as he can get it, and the Indian is in favor of this bill to permit the cash to be turned over to him in a few years. The people of Oklahoma are perfectly willing to have the cash turned over to the Indians, because it is likely to get into general circulation in Oklahoma in a very short time. Hence there is a community of interest here between the Indians, who want to spend the money, and the people down there, who would like to help him spend it there. So a little matter like this matter of taxes for 30 years on their lands is something nobody is hearing much about, but as soon as that money is gone and these Indians have to be cared for in hospitals and provided for in schools, then the gentleman from Oklahoma and the people down there will come to Congress and say, "Now, these Osage children need to be in the public schools. You are not giving them enough tuition. We want more tuition, because these Indians are not paying taxes."

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman wants to be fair——

Mr. CRAMTON. I think I should yield first to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. LEAVITT. How much time does the gentleman wish to consume of the hour? We did not fix any time, and I was wondering if the gentleman desired more time?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will get an hour and yield to the gentleman from Montana if he desires; if not, I will yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. LEAVITT. Does the gentleman understand what would be the situation if this or similar legislation is not enacted?

Mr. CRAMTON. I understand that section 1, as recommended by the committee on page 2 and on page 3 down to and including line 23, if enacted into law, would take care of the situation. That is important to be taken care of, and the other things I am speaking of, if handled at all by legislation, ought, I think, to be legislation a little more thoroughly worked out.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield to another question?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. The gentleman is aware of the fact that instead of the Indians coming before the Committee on Public Lands and asking only to get this money in their hands immediately, the ones who came to the committee also asked us to continue the restrictions, so that that very thing could not take place. The purpose of this bill is the protection of the Indians in accordance with their own wish.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is but a limited restriction, a restriction over their lands, which carries a tax exemption. But the bill throws wide open the expenditure of a great amount of cash from oil leases.

Mr. LEAVITT. If the bill or some portions of the bill should not be passed within a year or a year and a half, all restrictions will be wiped away.

Mr. CRAMTON. We have two sessions of the next Congress in addition to this session in which to accomplish what we want. It is important that the bill should pass, but pages 2 and 3 would take care of that situation. I object to these undesirable things being carried along with it in section 1. I hope the gentleman will eliminate and change these other things. It is inconsistent to say that for 30 years we are going to continue to prevent their selling a certain amount of land and at the same time say within 5 or 10 years we will turn over to them all the cash derived from oil leases.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. What I want to point out to the gentleman is that the total amount of money involved so far as these Indians of less than half blood are concerned is less than five millions, all told.

Mr. CRAMTON. How much more money have these Indians outside of that $5,000,000? How much additional have those Indians who are affected by the $5,000,000?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Those who would be turned loose have not to-day exceeding $5,000,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. When that $5,000,000 is gone, what is left?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. They will have their head rights, which at the present time is bringing them in $800 a quarter. But as to taxation, we are conceding that, because under treaties with the Seminoles and Cherokees the State of Oklahoma has to grant their homesteads untaxable as long as they are in the hands of the original holders and we feel that all our Indian citizens should be treated alike.

Mr. CRAMTON. We have no treaty with the Osages, and the fact that they have $5,000,000 of cash, which will be widely distributed in Oklahoma in the next five years——

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. This bill will give the Osage Indians about twelve hundred homesteads nontaxable as long as they are in the hands of the original allottees or their heirs. We in Oklahoma are not interested only in the situation where these Indians are being turned loose with all their money at once and are asking for it; we are trying to bring out a step-up plan of paying them as they go. The $5,000,000 is not taken into consideration by the people of Oklahoma at all.

Mr. CRAMTON. I know the gentleman from Oklahoma is not concerned in it. But it is news to me that the general public of Oklahoma has gotten to the point of altruism where $5,000,000 to be turned loose has no appeal to them

I want to inform the House that the passage of this bill in its present form is unnecessary. The first section can be passed to extend their restriction period. But if it is deemed necessary to extend that period for 30 years—an admission on the part of officials in Oklahoma and in the department that these Indians are not competent to handle their financial affairs—we ought not to turn over to them their cash capital. The gentleman says it will give them business experience.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; and then I will yield to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ].

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The gentleman refers to the necessity of extending these restrictions. Now there is a difference. This extension is for the benefit of the whole tribe. It extends their community interests, and if it had been done for every tribe of Indians in Oklahoma they would all have been better off. But this extension is not for any individual, and does give an extension to the trust period for those who have certificates of competency as well as those who have not.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not at all in sympathy with 30 years' exemption from taxation for those who are competent to handle their business affairs. As to those who are not competent, I am afraid of their lack of ability to handle $5,000,000.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I do not think the gentleman should object to it as long as it is in the hands of the original allottees, the same as with the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. CRAMTON. As long as it is in the hands of the original allottees or those of one-half blood, providing that until January 1, 1959—that is 30 years——

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. That is the extension of the trust period.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is an extension of the taxation period, mentioned at the bottom of page 3. Gentlemen have not been able to reconcile these inconsistencies that we are talking about.

The gentleman from Oklahoma is in error when he says the 30-year period does not apply to tax exemptions. It expressly does so apply, and my suggestion is not one of hostility to the bill. The bill ought to pass to accomplish the purposes of section 1, but I say we should debate it a while and then let it wait until next Wednesday. In the meantime, the committee can think it over and make sure we are doing the wise thing.

I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time. [Applause.]

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be discourteous in my opening statement, but the difficulty confronting the House now is this: That without very much study of a matter that has been before the committee for over a year the gentleman from Michigan raises some questions on some points. In my judgment, at the beginning of the debate I should have outlined what the real purpose of this bill is, and then I should have turned over the discussion of the details to the two gentlemen from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS and Mr. HOWARD], who are closely in touch with it, and to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SPROUL], who lives on the edge of the Osage country.

The purpose of this bill is to meet a very serious situation that exists with regard to the Osage Indians. It is the result of frequent visits to Washington on the part of delegates from the Osages and the Osage Tribal Council, calling the attention of the committee to the extremely serious situation that will exist if the present law, the law which is to-day in effect, should go on without amendment up to the 28th day of June, 1931.

This Congress, in 1906, passed an act that became a law on the 28th of June of that year, and which placed certain restrictions on the property of the Osage Indians, to continue for a period of 25 years, and that period of 25 years is going to be up in 1931. If that law as it now exists is not amended all of these restrictions are then going to be removed from these Osage people, and whether they are competent or whether they are incompetent to take care of their own affairs, they are going to be turned, with or without business experience or business judgment, over to the mercy of the white people. In a short time the very thing that the gentleman from Michigan is afraid of in connection with this bill would certainly take place.

Now, there have been certain business developments in the State of Oklahoma that have depended on the going into effect of the present law. I, as chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee, have not taken very much into consideration with respect to that, because I believe our duty in this instance is to legislate regarding the needs of the Indians and to see that we do not allow something to take place, through the error of a previous Congress, that will be injurious permanently to those people. So the committee, with long consideration, with frequent visits from the tribe, and long hearings, has had before it now for over a year the question of what ought to be done to meet the situation; and the committee, with divergent opinions that have been compromised by long study, has brought out this bill. It is a bill which has the approval of the Osage Tribal Council and a bill that the Osage Tribal Council, through its representatives here in Washington to-day, is asking particularly to have passed.

It is true there are some things in the bill that were not requested by the Osage Tribal Council, but there is nothing in the bill, so I am informed by the representatives of that council, objectionable to those Indians.

There are some sections of the bill to take care of situations that have arisen in connection with the leasing of oil lands, from conflicts between surface owners and lessees of oil lands, and matters of that kind. But what we have tried to get at is this, just to put it in brief form: We have tried to bring out a bill that will give added protection to the Osage Indians who need it and will not forever extend the protection of tax exemption and restrictions in the handling of funds over those who have become more white men than they are Indians, or who, during the 30-year period over which we are intending to extend these restrictions with regard to certain homestead areas, will have become entirely competent to handle their own affairs.

The public sentiment of this country is divided on the Indian question. We are trying to work out policies that will ultimately fit the Indians into our population, and we are at the same time trying to take into consideration the fact that many of them are not yet ready to handle their own business affairs.

Now, we did what in regard to that? We took into consideration the homesteads on which there is to be this extension of an additional period of 30 years, and said that so long as they remain in the hands of the present allottees they shall be free from taxation just as they are now. But suppose they are left to heirs who are of less than half Osage Indian blood? Then those restrictions would pass away; but just as long as they remain in the hands of Indians who are half or more of Osage Indian blood they will have this protection up to 30 years from the enactment of this bill. That is in this bill.

Now, what other way is there to compromise between the idea of giving adequate restriction to Indians who need it and ultimately removing those restrictions so that the Indians who become of less than half Indian blood and who, particularly in the Osage Tribe because of their wealth, are able to become educated and ultimately able to handle their own affairs and will ultimately have to do so?

This is what we have tried to meet here, and in trying to meet it we have in this bill certain sections that are vital to these Indians for their future protection. We have other sections in here that have been put in the bill and have been agreed upon to take care of situations in every case that have arisen out of the fact that this Osage Indian property and these leases of Osage Indian lands exist.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I wish the gentleman would bring out the question of nontaxability of the 160-acre homesteads for the benefit of the gentleman from Michigan and others who may not understand its meaning. It is clear to me. I have sat in the committee month after month, and I think it is something that is justified in view of the taxes that are paid out of the leasing revenues of the State; but I think it should be explained.

Mr. LEAVITT. In order not to take up all the time, what I think I ought to do at this time is to state just briefly and in as clear form as I can the urgency of this kind of legislation and the real purpose the committee has in reporting it out, and then I wish to yield to the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Oklahoma to go into the details of the matter; and I prefer to do this rather than carry on a discussion of the bill at this time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield for one question, for information?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Has the department made a report upon the bill substantially in the form as reported by the committee?

Mr. LEAVITT. This is the situation with regard to that: We have had before our committee now for several days and at various times for months, a delegation of the Osage Indians themselves, accompanied by their superintendent, Mr. J. George Wright, of Oklahoma, and there is nothing in this bill that has not been written there in conference with the Indian Bureau, with Mr. Wright, with the representatives of the Osage Indians themselves, and it has been a matter of development.

We have not tried to rush through this bill. We have let it pass along. We have never raised any objection, when it was reached on the Consent Calendar, to having it go over. We have not tried to have it considered in that way. We felt it ought to remain on the calendar a long time and be considered in a great deal of detail. This bill, in the form in which it is now presented to the Congress, comes to us with a resolution with regard to certain amendments that will all be offered to the bill, handed to me by the Osage Tribal Council, five of the eight members of the council being present in Washington at this time. The resolution states this:

On page 10, line 20, eliminate all of section 6 to and including the word "Agency," on page 12, line 21.

Section 7 to be left as written.

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the Osage Tribal Council, That the bill as amended by the insertions and eliminations hereinabove made be forwarded to the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to the honorable chairman of the House Committee on Indian Affairs, and to the honorable chairman of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, with the recommendation that the amendments included herein be made in the bill above mentioned and described.

FRED LOOKOUT,
Principal Chief.
GEORGE ALBERTY,
Acting Secretary.

We have accepted all these amendments that were worked out by the tribal council and the Indian Office. I can not say that is the form in which the bill is presented to the House, but that is the form in which we intend to bring it to a vote, because I expect to offer every one of these amendments.

These resolutions followed previous visits on the part of this delegation and previous letters and resolutions received, asking and urging that this legislation be brought before the House and that it be enacted for the benefit of the Indians themselves.

We have had this in mind and I feel that there is no more important piece of legislation before us. We are not trying to hurry it through the House. We want it fully discussed, but we do not want to be accused of bringing out something here to turn loose the money of these Indians or of doing anything to the detriment of these Indians. Every step has been taken after consultation with them. It is what they want, and the bill is so written, in our judgment, as to accomplish two things: To protect these Indians as long as they need protection and to take steps to fit them into our population and give them training in the handling of their own business, ultimately, when they cease to be of half or more Indian blood. [Applause.]

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SPROUL].

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I hope I may be pardoned for a few personal references. I have lived in my congressional district within 10 miles of the Oklahoma line for 45 years, 35 years of which has been near the Osage Indian Reservation. During the past 25 years I have been engaged in the oil and gas business near the Osage Indian lands. My leases have joined the reservation of the Osages. I have had business and social relations with the Quapaws and the Osages during the 45 years.

When I became a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs I only had a general idea concerning the legal and Government relations existing between the Federal Government and the 200, approximately, tribes of Indians. I spent many days preparing a brief of Indian affair law, setting forth my understanding of what the law is as existing between the Federal Government and the Indian tribes. I thought it my duty to become acquainted with the law of the relationship between the Government and the tribes in order to enable me to properly function, or, at least, to better function in the affairs of the committee.

As has been splendidly presented by the chairman of the committee [Mr. LEAVITT], we have spent much time and given sincere and careful consideration to the laws pertaining to the laws of the Osage Indians, and the question of the duty of Congress toward the tribe.

I am sure that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], by his remarks, did not mean to intimate that the committee was trying to put something over on the House that was not well considered, or that we did not have much capacity to deal with Indian affairs.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to say exactly the opposite. I have great confidence in the Committee on Indian Affairs—the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT], and the gentleman from Kansas, the gentleman from Oklahoma, and all members of that committee. I know their familiarity with Indian affairs. I have absolute confidence in their integrity and good intentions. I also know the great pressure under which busy men work, and sometimes legislation does not work out just as it is intended. All I have tried to do is to challenge the attention of the committee to some features in the bill which I have not been able to understand, and hope if there is any incongruity it can be worked out better than it has been.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. It is impossible for each Member of the House to become specially familiar with every bill that comes before us for consideration. I agree with the gentleman from Michigan that it would be well if we could have consideration of the various bills deferred from time to time until each one could thoroughly understand it, and not only that, but to have it drafted to exactly suit all opinions as to what it should be. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. I was interested in the statement of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT], in which he stated that certain property would remain exempt from taxation as long as the title was in Indians of at least half blood; but that if it came into the hands of Indians of less than half blood the exemption would be swept away. I was curious to understand why property, the title of which was in a half blood, should be any more exempt than property in the hands of a quarter blood.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I will try and explain that. The purpose of this bill is to extend the 30-year period for the Osage Indians to hold mineral rights under their former-owned land in communion or tribal interests—each having an equal amount of the money in the tribal fund. The period for extending the mineral rights for 30 years, until 1959, is the principal purpose of the bill. There are other provisions in the bill referred to by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT], chairman of the committee. One is with reference to the regulation of the operation of the oil business. There is no controversy about that.

Our friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] misunderstood, and I think the gentleman read inaccurately the provision of the bill for the automatic removal of restrictions, and the emancipation of the less-than-half blood.

Beginning on page 7, line 15, the bill reads:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall by or before the end of five years from the date of the approval of this act, pay to each restricted

Osage Indian of less than half Osage blood who is not incompetent under the laws of the State of Oklahoma, and who is at the date of approval of this act more than 25 years of age, the whole of his or her pro rata share of the tribal trust fund then being to the credit of such Indian.

Let me suggest to the committee that each one of these practically white people is to be 30 years of age; that is, 9 years older than the age at which white young men and young women throughout the country come into the possession of their inheritance, no matter how much it may be.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not see where the gentleman gets the 30 years. The language says 25 years.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. If the gentleman will read the bill carefully, he will see that it provides that the Indians who at the passage of this act are 25 years of age five years later shall get their full amount. This would make them 30 years of age.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the Secretary does not act until the maximum period elapses. The bill says on or before five years, and he might act the day after the bill passes. It is not so very material.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The bill does not seek to give the Secretary of the Interior one particle of power that he does not now have, and has not had, and has not been exercising, whether under sound or unsound discretion. So that these quarter-bloods, and eighth-bloods, and sixteenths, and sixty-fourth bloods who are getting large sums of money quarterly out of their communal share of the tribal funds will get their full share of the tribe's accumulated funds when 30 years of age. They are men and women who have been educated in modern schools, who drive about over the country in Packard cars, who are far better dressed than the average white person, who bear the appearance of educated and cultured men and women. They are to get their share of this accumulated fund when they arrive at 30 years of age.

The relationship between the Federal Government and the Indians is that of a guardian to a ward. Certainly it is the duty of this great Government, functioning as a guardian of these Indians, to try to its utmost to qualify the wards for good citizenship. Certainly this type of Indian, when he has been educated in modern schools and has mingled with white people until 30 years of age, should be declared qualified for citizenship except when under guardianship in the State in which he lives.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired, and the one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition, and I shall be glad to yield time to the gentleman, such time as he desires.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for one hour in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield the gentleman from Kansas such time as he desires. I shall be glad if the gentleman will answer a question or two with particular reference now to the class affected on page 7, beginning at line 15, where they are over 25 years of age and of less than half blood. All of this accumulated fund is then to be turned over to them.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes; their respective shares——

Mr. CRAMTON. And the restriction continues to apply to their 160 acres.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is nontaxable for 30 years.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. No; that is nontaxable until Congress shall otherwise provide.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is an intimation of 30 years. Roughly speaking, how much are these 160 acres worth, the mineral rights not being included?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. That depends upon where they are situated.

Mr. CRAMTON. What would be the maximum?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. It would depend upon the improvements upon the land. Generally, they have a $10,000 to $30,000 residence upon it. It would be very difficult for me to tell, but I should say upon an average of about $15,000 or $20,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. What is the average cash that is to be turned over to them in this 5-year period?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I would not be able to inform the gentleman on that?

Mr. CRAMTON. Would the gentleman from Oklahoma indicate? My impression is that it is $5,000,000 and there are 90 or 100 of them.

Mr. HASTINGS. It has been running about $12,000 to $15,000 a year.

Mr. CRAMTON. This accumulated fund is $5,000,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. That depends on how much each individual has to his credit.

Mr. CRAMTON. If I am correct in my recollection of the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD], there will be $5,000,000 affected by this, and with less than 100 Indians, that would be something like $50,000 each. In other words, we are going to continue for 30 years a guardianship over their land worth maybe $25,000, but we are going to turn over to them within 5 years $50,000, or whatever it is, in cash. As a matter of fact, I have a feeling that the cash is much larger than $50,000.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I think the gentleman is entirely in error. I would venture the assertion from general knowledge that it is far less than $50,000 on an average.

Mr. CRAMTON. What I do not understand is why, if they are so thoroughly competent and drive their fine automobiles around on the roads of Oklahoma, they should not be declared competent and pay taxes to keep up those roads.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. By agreement they pay—the tribe pays—into the county 1 per cent of the gross production of oil in Osage County, which by mutual understanding with the county commissioners amounts to more than the taxes on their homesteads would amount to, and for that reason the county commissioners think it would be fair and equitable to the county to continue the exemption upon their homesteads.

Mr. CRAMTON. Do they pay a higher tax on their receipts from oil leases than the whites pay?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes; they pay identically the same tax, 3 per cent of the gross production, the same as the operators, and then pay 1 per cent in addition, which in the estimation of the county commissioners yields the county a bigger revenue than a tax on their homesteads would yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is that to continue after all the restrictions are removed from their property?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. They rate or consider them together.

Mr. CRAMTON. So that after the restrictions are all removed and they are in the same position as to property the whites are they are to be taxed on their property the same as the whites. Then, as I understand the gentleman, in addition they pay 1 per cent which the whites do not pay.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. That speaks eloquently for what the State of Oklahoma will do for the Indians if they have the opportunity.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Congress did that in the act of 1921 which imposed that 1 per cent.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am just trying to prevent any such mistake here.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think it will expire in 1946. We extended that period to 1946.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. We tried to consider and act upon this bill without any prejudice for or against Oklahoma, but for the welfare of the Indians. Now let me suggest further in reference to the payments of debts of these less than half-blood Indians: They have neglected the payment of their bills for the necessaries of life until the merchants who have supplied them in the cities around about Pawhusky hold claims against them for clothing, implements for their farms, for grocery bills, for drug bills, for doctor bills, for nurse bills, and so forth, and they are not paying them. They live in my district in different parts and live in different parts of the country; and appear, as I have suggested, in Packard automobiles, well dressed, well educated, and with plenty of money apparently to pay their dry-goods bills and auto-repair bills and hotel bills and living expenses in traveling all over the United States. So it occurred to those of us who are intimate with these conditions that inasmuch as every three months they have been getting from $800 to $1,200 each that the Indians should be taught—we call them Indians, but we might just as well or more properly call them white people—should be taught the lessons of integrity and honesty; that when they promise to pay a bill they ought to keep the promise; and, if they will not, then those in charge of their money should compel the keeping of their promises and teach by practice as well as precept the graces of honesty and integrity.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Can these people continue to get credit with these merchants?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. They continue to get credit with the merchants they purchase from. Their purchasing places are anywhere over the country where they are known, where they can come and be known that they are Osage and live at Pawhusky. They travel all over the United States. I will say to the members of the committee that there are no people in the United States that travel so much over the United States as those people do with their Packards. And think of it! Our present administration enables them to buy Packard cars, and Buicks, and Nashes, and cars of that character and pay for them on the installment plan and pay at 8 per cent interest on the money they owe for the automobiles, while their grocery bills, dry-goods bills, and clothing bills go unpaid.

With some of us who know, it is not simply a theory. We know these conditions, and we feel—and the intelligent, fair-minded members of the tribe who are of less than half-blood concede and assert—that it will be a good lesson for these Indians to be taught. They are now taking advantage of the bankruptcy law. Just to show you how they become involved, they are taking advantage of the bankruptcy laws. Let us consider how our good friend from Michigan would have this $1,000 every month protected against garnishment and attachment by those who furnish them with bread and meat and medical attention and clothing. The Indians have knowledge that there is a department of the Government that will aid them in the protection of their money. Here are questions that come to us who are members of the committee, who have made a study of these problems, and who have considered what is the prime and the great duty of the Federal Government as the guardian of the Indians. Is it the proper thing to say to these Indians, "We are going to protect and conserve your great wealth, given to you to exploit and speculate with, and buy from whomsoever you can buy," and save them say, "The Government will not pay our bills. We will keep our money and go on. We do not want our restrictions removed, because then we might get rid of our money. We have men up there on the floor of the House who will not allow our restrictions to be removed, and our funds will be kept for us forever, and we will continue to be wards, even if we be eligible for President or Vice President of the United States"? This is another view of it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CRAMTON. This is not controversial. The gentleman spoke about these Indians going through bankruptcy proceedings. Do I understand that in any case an Osage Indian was discharged in bankruptcy; an Indian who owned a homestead of more than 160 acres, worth $25,000 or $30,000, and who had an undivided interest in the tribal funds estimated at $50,000, insuring a regular income—under those circumstances has a Federal court granted them relief in bankruptcy?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. That is my understanding; and one well-known judge has held that the fund and payment is not subject to attachment, and that likewise the tribal funds are not to be charged to the Indians as business assets.

Mr. CRAMTON. If these Indians do not pay their grocers and their clothiers and doctors when they have an assured income as at present, how are you going to compel them to pay their bills when we shall have turned over to them their principal and they have squandered it?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I will answer the gentleman. In the first place, the automobiles seem to have been purchased with the approval of the Government. I do not indorse that. I do not think that ought to have been done. But nevertheless it has been done, to the neglect of their grocery and other bills for the necessaries of life. But this bill provides for shorting these Indians, so to speak, to the extent of 25 per cent quarterly of their money when there exist just debts for the necessaries of life. It has been considered both by members of the committee and the leading Indians themselves that it will be a good and valuable lesson to them as to what they should do in the matter of paying their bills and economizing and living within their income, so that by the arrival of the 5-year time, when they will get their accumulated money, they will have been taught valuable lessons in economy and regard for the obligations of paying of their debts. All these matters have been carefully weighed and studied with reference to the actual facts and requirements concerning the Indians and their lands.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. From what the gentleman from Kansas has said we would naturally infer that these Indians are improvident. If you removed the restrictions from their money, would they not still continue to be extravagant and by pay time will have nothing?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Unless something is done to make them pay.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. When the pay time comes will not the white man have all the money and the Indian will have nothing left?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. It will be much less so if you pass this bill than if you did not pass it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is not the Government policy with respect to all its employees not to consider itself a collecting agency? Does not the department say it is not in the collecting business, and does it not send such letters as complain of unpaid debts to employees back to the writers?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Such experience as I have had is this: The department sends word down to the postmaster, for example, to notify the rural delivery carrier who does not pay his debts that he had better resign or pay his debts. That is the way Uncle Sam treats postal employees. That is an illustration of the experience I have had down in the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In cases of that kind Congress has held—and the department has held—that if merchants or others do any business in extending credit to Indians of that kind, whether they are dead-beat Indians or otherwise, the Government agencies could not be used to compel them to pay the merchants to whom they owe debts.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. That has been tried, with no success.

Oftentimes there are hospital bills, nurse bills, medical bills, and drug bills which are incurred very suddenly and without time to communicate with the Government and get authority to incur them. So if bills of that kind could not be incurred the Indian and his family might suffer very greatly. It has been impracticable to work out all of these things without credit to Indians for necessaries——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the reason that the proprietor of a grocery store, of a boot and shoe store, or any other store furnishing the necessaries of life, could not refuse to sell, except for cash, to an Indian who receives as much money as these Indians receive.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. There is no reason, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, right there. Everybody, I suppose, knows of quite well-to-do white people—not quarter bloods or half bloods but pure Caucasians dating away back, at least they say so—who are such proverbial dead-beats that although independently well to do, they can not get one dollar's worth of groceries on credit, so it would seem to me it would be the easiest thing in the world to stop a dead-beat Indian.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Well, the Indian in the gentleman's country may be very different from the Indian in our country. A free white man might have a homestead that might be free from an execution, but he does not get away from paying his grocery bills very long. However, the difference between a white man and an Indian is that the Government of the United States is not the guardian of the white individual but is the guardian of these Indians, and it is our duty to aid them in handling their money and property in such a way as to make the best kind of citizens out of them and prevent them from being indigent if we can, and to teach them to be truthful and honest and industries citizens.

I do not contend for one minute that we are dealing the most wisely with the Osage Indians. I very much doubt it, but I surely think the provisions of this bill are full of merit as far as they go.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, Osage County, in which these Indians live, is located in the district which I represent. This bill was brought to me last spring by the Osage Council, containing many of the provisions it now contains, asking that I introduce it. I took the precaution of introducing this bill by request, and not giving my indorsement to the measure at that time in its entirety by introducing it as my own.

I want to say to the Members of the House that in all of my six years' experience in Congress I have never seen a measure that has been studied, scrutinized, and restudied, by not only the entire Indian Affairs Committee but a subcommittee thereof, than has the measure before us. When it was first introduced it was sent to a subcommittee. The Osage Indians, the Osage Tribal Council, the superintendent of their agency, and parties interested otherwise appeared and were given hearings. Then, when the subcommittee had made a report to our committee, we again, as a whole committee, opened up the matter and went into the measure from every angle. The bill was reported out in the other session. We did not push it on the calendar. It has been on the calendar since last May, and within the last two weeks we have again given time to the Osage Council, the superintendent of the agency, and the Bureau of Indian Affairs to appear before the committee, discuss the bill, and make recommendations. Out of all of these hearings and this study we have brought a bill before the House which we believe will give proper protection to the Osage Indian in every particular and yet do justice to those who live among them, develop their property, and trade with them.

Now, let us see for a moment what we are attempting to do in this bill. First, we are attempting, and very necessarily so, to provide for the holding of his mineral rights of all of them within the tribes and the moneys of the restricted ones under the supervision of the Government until 1959. If legislation of this kind is not passed the result will be that in 1931 the restrictions come off and the Indian will be left to the mercy of those whom some of you fear so much. That must be done. Now, then, we get to the matter of exemption from taxation. Let me say first that as to those of half blood or less, around which so much controversy has gathered, there are only about 80 involved, so far as their finances are concerned, and only 25 have allotments that will be nontaxable. Consequently neither myself nor the State of Oklahoma, nor the committee, is waiving any right to taxation for the purpose of turning this money loose. On the other hand, when Oklahoma became a State we found that the Government had treaties with the Cherokees and the Seminoles which made their lands forever nontaxable, or, rather, made their lands nontaxable as long as they were held in the hands of the original allottees. We had to accept that in our statehood agreement with the nation. Along with that were the provisions in the treaties that the Government had with the Osages, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Creeks, that for a period, which expires in 1931, the State of Oklahoma would keep their lands nontaxable. We have lived up to that. Now, as the period is approached for the lands of these Indians to go on the tax rolls, we have taken the position in Oklahoma that these Indians are citizens of Oklahoma.

If the Cherokee and the Seminole are not to be taxed as long as the lands are in the hands of the original allottee, I feel that all our Indian citizens should be treated alike and are willing that the Osages shall be placed upon the same basis as to taxation. This is the explanation of the nontaxable provision in this bill.

The Osage Indians, however, I will say, went to the county commissioners of Osage County and asked for this provision and the Osage County commissioners recommended it to the Congress, and their recommendation will be found in the hearings on the measure.

Now, what next do we do? I have been informed by the secretary of the Osage Council as to this matter since this discussion began. Of the Indians of less than half blood, whose restrictions this bill seeks to eventually remove, there are just about 80. They are not the blanket Indians to which the minds of many turn when they think of the Indians of yesteryear. They are people who have a small amount of Indian blood in their veins. Their degree of Indian relationship running from one sixty-fourth or one one-hundred-and-twentieth up to almost half bloods.

The Government has accumulated this money while they have been in school. They are all now past 20 years of age, but what has happened is this: With a place where every three months they could go and get from $800 to $2,500 as their quarterly payments, it has not been conducive, in too many instances, to making of them business men and women, to whom we should turn over their entire fortune when they become a certain age. They can continually present evidence of their competency in every way, diplomas from colleges that some of us can not present. Educational advantages that some of us never had, they have had, and when they present such evidence their restrictions have been removed from time to time and we have found that not to be the best policy. So in this bill, in order to eventually emancipate them, as they have been promised ever since the days of Grover Cleveland, we have written a provision that those that are not yet 25 years of age shall be given one-fifth of their accumulated funds.

Then they will have two years within which to go out and experiment, and it has been my experience that even the boy who lost his first taw got another one if he had it in him. So we propose in this bill to give him one-fifth of it, let him have two years with that one-fifth and then gradually give it to him until 10 years has elapsed, and then give him a certificate of competency. But we figure that if he has reached the age of 25 he is further along toward maturity and this bill provides that if he has already reached that age we provide that his money shall be paid to him in 5 years instead of 10 years. It is a plan which we knowingly, earnestly, and honestly conceived to be for the benefit of the Indian and one that would help to bring about his emancipation.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is a matter which I discussed when I was on the floor and which I brought then to the attention of the gentleman with respect to what seemed to be an inconsistency between the opening provision of section 3 on page 6, the 10-year period for the payment of this fund, and the proviso on page 7, providing a 5-year period in certain cases. Is the gentleman yet prepared to show the consistency of the two provisions?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. If anything in this bill is not made entirely clear, I am perfectly willing it shall be, but the intention of the committee, I will say to the gentleman from Michigan, is that as to those who are not 25 years of age, the payment of their money shall be extended over a period of 10 years. If they have reached the age of 25, then it shall be extended over a period of five years, and we are perfectly willing that anything that shall make that conclusive may be written into the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. My purpose has been to direct the attention of the committee to these inconsistencies in the hope that they may be corrected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I can not see where there is any inconsistency in that proposition. The Indian who happens to be 25 years of age at the passage of this bill at the end of five years will be 30, and the purpose of the bill is to emancipate the Indians at the age of 30.

Mr. CRAMTON. I can see what the subsection on page 7 does. That relates to those who are at least 25 and have less than half Osage blood. That is quite specific, but the provision on page 6 seems to be broad enough to include them as well as others.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. It does, and that is the existing law and a law that has been on the statute books for some time, and the department requested that that be not stricken out, so that the department might anticipate the 30-year period of emancipation by intervening and giving them their certificates before they arrived at that age.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not desirable on one page to say that it must be paid in 10 years, and on the next page to say that it shall be paid in 5 years. I think that they had better be reconciled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Now, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the committee, I represent these Indians in the Congress. I introduced this bill by request. I have no interest whatever in the Osage Nation. I have not one penny of interest, or one dime, or any interest, except the protection of these Indians. I have worked on the subcommittee and I have worked on the general committee, and this legislation, I think, will protect my Indian constituency, and do justice to them. I believe it is a progressive measure of Osage Indian legislation. If I did not believe that I would be here against it. I hope when you take it up again you will pass this legislation. I am perfectly willing and more than anxious that any language in it may be corrected to the end that we get real legislation protecting the Indians, as well as all others. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] desire time?

Mr. HASTINGS. I would like a little time before we conclude the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman desires time, I will yield him 10 minutes now or he can wait until next Wednesday.

Mr. LEAVITT. My purpose is not to consider or urge the completion of the bill to-night. I think the Members should have proper time to read the RECORD and perfectly understand the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. It is perfectly agreeable to me to go over until next Wednesday.

OPERATION OF THE FEDERAL BUDGET SYSTEM

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the speech of the President at the Budget meeting, and also the speech of Director General Lord.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to do so, I herewith include as an extension of my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the address delivered by the President of the United States, Hon. Calvin Coolidge, at the sixteenth regular meeting of the Business Organization of the Government at Memorial Continental Hall, in Washington, last Monday evening, the 23d instant; and also the address delivered on the same occasion by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, Gen. Herbert M. Lord.

The address of President Coolidge follows:

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT

Members of the Government's business organizations, the present fiscal year will bring to a close eight years of conducting the finances of the Government of the United States under the Budget system. It was put into operation to save the country from economic disaster. It has been fully justified by the results. In the first instance, the President, of course, is responsible for the direction of the system. In the second place, that responsibility is shared with the Congress in making appropriations. In the next place, the responsibility for efficient expenditures rests with the chiefs of the various departments. But in the final analysis, success could have been achieved only by the loyal cooperation and faithful service of the great rank and file of the Government personnel. To that great body, of which you are the representatives, the people owe a debt of gratitude, which I especially wish to acknowledge at this last Budget meeting of my administration. Without their devotion to the cause of constructive economy we could have done nothing. With it we have been able to do everything. The victory has been their victory, and the praise should be their praise.

When we began the task in June, 1921, of reconstructing our public finances, it looked almost impossible of accomplishment. The entire Government structure was permeated with extravagance. The expenditures for that fiscal year, exclusive of debt reductions, were about $5,000,000,000. The interest charge alone was more than $1,000,000,000, and our outstanding indebtedness was nearly $24,000,000,000. The business of the country was prostrate. Its different branches of agriculture, commerce, banking, manufacturing, and transportation were suffering from severe depression. Employment was difficult to secure. Wages were declining. Five million people were out of work. The price of securities, even of Government bonds, was very low. It was difficult to find any market for commodities. Confidence in our entire economic structure had been shaken. Progress had stopped.

It is easy to see what the condition of the people would be under such circumstances. Those who had property, even though it was much diminished in value, could take care of themselves, as they always can. But to those who were carrying on business with borrowed capital and had outstanding notes and mortgages there seemed nothing ahead but ruin. Wage earners and their families were faced with want and misery. The cause of this distress was not difficult to ascertain. The country had been living beyond its means. It had been spending much more than it was earning, which meant that it had been using up its capital. The savings of previous years were being exhausted, principally through Government extravagance.

This was not a pleasant picture to behold. If relief were possible, those who were able to provide it could well afford to be charged with considering nothing but the material side of life, with advocating a penurious and cheeseparing policy, and with neglecting to supply the public needs. If a remedy could be found, when it was put into operation business would revive, profits would increase, employment would be plentiful, wages would be good, the distress of the people would be relieved, and a great condition of contentment and prosperity would prevail. Whatever criticisms there might be against those who had labored to secure this result, the satisfactory condition of the country would be a sufficient answer and a sufficient reward.

The evils and abuses of Government extravagance were perfectly apparent. It was believed and, as experience has demonstrated correctly believed, that the distress of the country would be relieved if Government extravagance ceased. It was for this purpose that the radical and revolutionary system was adopted of centralizing in the President the primary authority for the recommendation of all departmental estimates and establishing for his information and advice the Bureau of the Budget.

Seemingly without effort, but actually by hard and effective work, the change was wrought. Each of the succeeding years brought an ever-increasing improvement in the business of Government. Expenditures diminished until 1927, when, exclusive of the amount applied to debt reduction, they reached a point below the $3,000,000,000 mark. This was $2,000,000,000 below 1921. Billions were cut from the public debt, with a large saving of interest. The first tax reduction came in November, 1921, and was followed by three succeeding reductions. Funds were saved to meet the cost of our much-needed public improvements, which had been in abeyance during the war period. Short-time notes and long-time bonds were paid off and refunded at lower rates.

Working in that spirit which forcefully asserts itself in time of need, the executive and legislative branches of the Government, with the backing of the people, have inserted a golden page in our history. It fittingly portrays that peace hath its victories no less than war. In the short period of seven and one-half years the public debt has been reduced $6,667,000,000. The total saving in interest alone from this and refunding operations is $963,000,000. Four reductions in taxes have returned to the people approximately $2,000,000,000 a year, which would have been required had the revenue act of 1918 remained in force. Two and one-half million people have been entirely relieved of all Federal taxation.

One of the first essentials in the work of making the Federal Government a real business organization was the welding of the various departments and independent establishments into a harmonious, efficient concern. We found 43 independent departments and establishments each operating under its own customs and rules, utterly regardless of the existence of other departments which were parts of the same great establishment, the United States of America. There was little community of thought or harmony of action. Deep-seated hostility between certain Government agencies existed. That the National Government ought to be one great entity responsible for the happiness of 120,000,000 of people was entirely overlooked in the exclusive devotion of groups of Federal officials and employees to one particular subordinate department. This same obsession often characterized the relation between bureaus in the same department. Heroic effort was needed to substitute national loyalty for department and bureau loyalty. Efficiency and economy in operation were hopeless under such conditions. The situation called for a revolution in the attitude of Government agencies toward each other. Exclusive devotion to their subordinate even though important departments must give place to loyalty to the whole Government. To effect this great transformation a wide coordinating plan was put into effect. Representatives from the various departments and establishments were called together and organized into effective committees and boards to simplify and unify procedures and eliminate tortuous, wasteful, and unbusinesslike methods. In this way all the major activities of the Government were studied and harmonized by the efforts of our own personnel. Out from this study and effort sprang a business organization that compares favorably with like establishments in the business world in efficiency and unified control. Harmonious cooperation has won.

In pre-Budget days not a single administrative form indicated there was such a thing as a National Government. The several departments had their own business forms in varying and confusing multiplicity. To-day we have 38 Federal forms displacing the many hundreds that served to confuse business and add to the cost of government. Not a single specification contributed to good government business. To-day we have 602 standardized specifications which cover in large part the entire field of Federal requirements. We are using one uniform Government lease in place of several hundreds of departmental leases, while uniform construction and supply contracts in connection with our standardized specifications are contributing daily to good business and material saving. Our great real estate and rental interests, our hospitalization, our buying, selling, and printing, our patent interests, and office methods are subject to the same careful study and supervision.

Out in the field we have our area coordinators and our 280 Federal business associations with 63 more in the making. These unique Government agencies are spreading the gospel of efficient government economically administered. They are our most trenchant exponents of cooperation. The intangible savings resulting from this coordinating work mounts into millions yearly. The work is not spectacular, but it is the very foundation of good business. I believe that the Federal Government to-day is the best conducted big business in the world. To these faithful workers in our coordinating agencies, in Washington and elsewhere, the country owes a great debt of gratitude. This picture of widespread commitment to good government throughout the service—and extravagant government is not good government—is most inspiring and encouraging. We have demonstrated that saving results from efficiency, and efficiency comes from saving.

Largely because of such work as this, less than two years from the time when the lowest point was reached, the country was very generally restored to normal conditions. From that time on there has been an upward swing, broken only by short static periods or slight temporary recessions. The closing months of 1928 and the opening weeks of 1929 have seen American industry and commerce at the highest point ever attained in time of peace.

In order to understand more clearly what the effect of these efforts has been on the country, it is only necessary to compare some of the major economic factors of 1928 with those of 1921. The output of our factories increased during that interval nearly 60 per cent; in some cases, such as iron and steel production, it was more than doubled. The production of the mining industries as a group was at least 50 per cent greater last year than seven years before. The construction of new buildings was much more than twice as great in 1928 as in 1921. The advance was especially notable and gratifying in the building of homes and schools. Check payments outside of New York City, where the volume is much affected by stock-exchange transactions, have increased by about 57 per cent over 1921. Railway traffic has been about one-third greater than in the earlier year and has been carried on with far greater efficiency and dispatch. The number of automobiles registered is now nearly three times as great as at the beginning of 1921, and the number manufactured during 1928 was more than three times as great as during 1921. Electric power production last year was considerably more than double what it was seven years before. From practically nothing, the business of radio broadcasting has become enormous, and the number of radio-receiving sets produced exceeds 13,000,000. The burdens of our housewives have been immeasurably lightened and their lives broadened by the introduction of numerous electrical conveniences and devices, most of which were unknown a few years ago.

The extent that the financial reserves of our citizens have increased is strikingly apparent. Savings deposits rose from $16,500,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1921 to more than $28,000,000,000 on June 30, 1928. Between 1921 and 1927 the amount of life insurance in force very nearly doubled, and the total of such protection came to exceed $87,000,000,000. The assets of building and loan associations have risen from less than $2,900,000,000 in 1921 to more than $7,178,000,000 in 1927.

The record of the advance in education in this country during recent years has been truly astonishing. Figures for 1927 and 1928 are not yet available, but in the short period of six years, between 1920 and 1926, the number of students in our high schools, colleges, and universities grew from about three to neary five millions. There has been an immense increase in the output of reading matter of all kinds.

With all our increase in production, the numbers of persons employed in several of our major activities have, apart from the sharp recovery after the depression of 1921, tended to decrease. At present there are fewer persons employed in manufactures, mining, railway transportation, and agriculture than in 1919, and the increase as compared with 15 or 20 years ago is decidedly less when compared with the total population of the country. This change means the elimination of waste and is an evidence of advance in living standards. With the constantly rising efficiency and greater production per man the quantity of goods available per capita of the population has increased materially. It has also been possible to set some workers free to furnish us services as distinguished from commodities—services of distribution, automobile travel, recreation, and amusement. By this means the whole number of persons employed has increased.

I do not claim that action by the National Government deserves all the credit for the rapid restoration of our country's business from the great depression of 1921, or for the steady progress that has since taken place. Unquestionably, however, wise governmental policies, and particularly wise economy in Government expenditures with steady reduction of the national debt, have had a dominant influence. The people gained confidence in themselves because of increasing confidence in their Government. The reduction of taxation made possible by the cutting down of Government expenditures left more income in the hands of the people, enabling them to increase their expenditures, and thereby not only to obtain greater comforts, but to add to the demand for commodities; it likewise helped to provide funds for building up the capital of the country and augmenting its productive capacity.

The public needs have not been neglected. We have been able to embark upon a building program which for public works, hospitals, and our military housing requirements will cost nearly half a billion dollars. We are amortizing the cost of the adjusted service certificate fund of veterans of the World War and the retirement funds of our civil establishment at a cost of $132,000,000 a year. Additional funds are being devoted to flood-control work and improvements made necessary by disasters which have overtaken our own States and outlying territory. These expenditures could not have been financed without an economical administration. We could not have had tax reductions and the added expense of these necessary things without careful and orderly management of the business of government.

In this period of greatest prosperity the purely business phases of administration, the interests of commerce, and the encouragement of industry have not been permitted to absorb our attention and mortgage our revenue to the exclusion of the more humane objects and purposes. The duty and privilege of providing for our veterans and employees who have need of relief have not been neglected. The Employees' Compensation Commission in 1928 paid out $3,267,000 for the benefit of injured Government employees, while the expenditure for pensions, compensation, insurance, and care for the veterans of various wars exceeded in 1928, $600,000,000. In all these fields of need the Government has disbursed with generous hand, and its hospitals and homes for its wards thickly dot the land. In times of great disaster it opened the doors of its Treasury.

On the artistic, altruistic, and patriotic side there has been no parsimonious withholding. The beautiful Arlington Memorial Bridge that is spanning the Potomac, the preservation and marking of historic spots, the character of the public buildings being erected throughout the country, eloquently deny the charge that we are only a commercial Nation with no regard for anything but the pursuit of the dollar. During these late years there has been a steady growth of interest in the higher and better things, and I am convinced that the tone and character of the Nation has constantly improved.

We are giving the people better service than ever before. The post office is extending to the people, rich and poor, ever-increasing facilities. The Public Health Service protects us from plague and other evils with a painstaking care heretofore unequaled. In all our lives, sleeping and waking, we are guarded and protected and helped by the Federal Government in more and more ways. This has been done under the restrictions of a policy of drastic economy, which have saved from waste the funds to make increased and better public service possible. You certainly have given abundant reason for being proud of our great Government.

In spite of all these remarkable accomplishments, much yet remains to be done. We still have an enormous public debt of over $17,000,000,000. In spite of all our efforts for economy, our great savings in interest, and our four reductions in taxes, the expenses of the Federal Government during the last year are showing a tendency to increase. While much has been done in reducing the costs, by far the largest item of credit is due for preventing increased expenditures. A short time ago there were pending before the Congress, and seriously being advocated, bills which would have doubled our annual cost of government. At the present time committees have reported, and there are on the calendar in the Congress, bills which would cost more than a billion dollars. Had there not been a constant insistence upon a policy of rigid economy many of these bills would have become law.

It would be a great mistake to suppose that we can continue our national prosperity, with the attendant blessings which it confers upon the people, unless we continue to insist upon constructive economy in government. The margin between prosperity and depression is always very small. A decrease of less than 10 per cent in the income of the Nation would produce a deficit in our present Budget. The costs of State and local governments are rapidly mounting. From $3,900,000,000 in 1921 the National Industrial Conference Board estimates that they reached $7,931,000,000 in 1927. This is such a heavy drain on the earnings of the people that it is the greatest menace to the continuance of prosperity. It is a red flag warning us of the danger of depression and a repetition of the disaster which overtook the country in the closing days of 1920. It is a warning that should be heeded by every one intrusted with the expenditure or appropriation of public funds. It is the reason that further commitments by the National Government for any new projects not absolutely necessary should be faithfully resisted.

The results of economy which have meant so much to our own country, and indirectly to the world, could not have been successful without the Bureau of the Budget. It has been able in eight years to reduce estimates by $2,614,000,000. The ability with which that bureau has been managed is due to its director. Since I have been President it has been under General Lord. In all our meetings I have spoken of him in terms of commendation. He has continued to justify all I have ever said in his praise. I wish to take this last opportunity which I shall have during my administration publicly to express to him again my appreciation of the high character of his work and my increasing confidence in the Budget system. No friend of sound government will ever consent to see it weakened. No one who admires fidelity and character in the public service will ever fail to be grateful for the services of General Lord, who will now address you.

ADDRESS OF GEN. H. M. LORD

Mr. President and members of the business organization of the Government, some years ago Peter Cornelius, a more or less well-known musician, composed a musical number called "Ein Ton" or "One Tone." One note dominates the entire composition. Measure follows measure, chord succeeds chord in rich and varying harmony, but that persistent, never-changing note marches on, commanding the musical unfoldment. It is always there, insistently asserting itself. The pleasing harmonies, the musical variations, the changing phases of this unusual number are artistically woven in and around that ever-appealing, ever-insistent, never-varying, never-silent note. Any departure from that commanding tone not in accord with the law of harmony would yield an unmusical dissonance to mar the beauty and perfection of the composition and discordantly interfere with the enjoyment afforded the listener.

Twice each year for eight years we have met in friendly conference to discuss the Nation's business. These conferences have all been "One Tone" gatherings. Their dominant note has always been "economy." No matter what the subject discussed, the keynote has always been the same—"economy"—with its inseparable comrade and companion, "efficiency." Our efforts to make effective this never-changing note of constructive economy, our endeavor to achieve harmonious and worthwhile results have, I am sure, been more successful than the attempt of the colored brother to entice music from his saxophone. A friend asked him how he was getting on with his saxophone.

"Porely, porely," was the discouraged reply. "Ah blows into that instrument the sweetest noises you all evah heard, but de mos' awful of a blah comes out of de otha end."

In our campaign for constructive economy the aim has always been to plead for the obvious, possible, and reasonable thing, to urge policies that would appeal to Federal administrators as sound and workable. We have tried to show our fellow workers that what we wanted them to do was what they should do. If our efforts for retrenchment and efficiency were to be successful we must have something more than perfunctory assistance from service people. Hearty, whole-souled cooperation was necessary. That kind of cooperation we have had. It is because of this attitude on the part of our personnel, because of their interest in better administration, that so few false notes, so few discordant blahs, have marred the harmonious full-toned chords of accomplishment, woven in and about that dominating, never-ceasing note of "economy."

THE BUDGET SYSTEM

We have a great deal to say about the Budget system—possibly too much. I wish, however, to emphasize the fact that the Budget organization comprises not only the President, the Budget Bureau, the Budget officers of the various departments and establishments, the Chief Coordinator, our splendid coordinating boards, the area coordinators, and the 280 Federal business associations, but includes every person in the Federal service. When we speak of Budget achievements we are voicing the accomplishments of the people in the Federal service and the Congress that in its wisdom gave us our Budget system.

The man of the house arrived home from militia drill and pridefully informed the members of his family that he had been appointed corporal.

"Are we corporals, too?" eagerly asked the children.

"No, no, children," replied the mother of the family, "only me and your pa."

But not so in this successful fight against waste, indifference, and inefficiency, for we are all corporals and entitled to wear the chevrons of honorable Budget service.

The Federal Budget system is no longer an experiment. It is not strange that its entry into Government operation was regarded with misgivings by administrators who through years of service had experienced little control over their estimates and less control over their expenditures. It, however, has come to stay. Chief Executives, Cabinet officers, Budget Directors, bureau chiefs will continue to play their parts and pass off the stage, but the fundamental importance of budgeting is so evident that it has become the fixed policy of the Government. The manner in which the policy is carried out, the methods of the Budget Bureau, may be legitimate objects of criticism, but the system itself defies attack. And the attitude to-day of the people in the service leads one to think that they believe in it and approve of it. It is possible, however, in some cases, that this attitude may be one of resignation. Said one friend to another:

"I understand your daughter is taking piano lessons. What progress is she making?

"Improving, I think," was the answer, "either that or we are getting more used to it."

A NEW STARTING POINT

In Budget discussions heretofore we have made our comparisons with the year 1921. That was the last year free from Budget control. The total expenditure for that year, exclusive of debt reduction and postal expenses, was $5,115,927,689.30. In 1927—six years later and six Budget years—that extraordinary outgo had been battered down to $2,974,029,674.62. This gave us a reduction of $2,141,898,014.68 in six years. The figures I have given, which have been challenged, are exact—taken from the records even to the last straggling penny—and I think can be understood even by the schoolboy who said he had no difficulty with algebra and geometry, but could not understand mathematics.

That year—1927—was also distinguished as the year of largest surplus—$635,809,921.70, which you may recall we applied to the debt, saving thereby $25,000,000 in annual interest.

EXPENDITURES AND GROWTH

That 1927 figure of $2,974,029,674.62 is the lowest expenditure level this Government will ever see. The country is growing, expanding, developing gloriously. Its population is increasing—105,000,000 in 1920 and 120,000,000 in 1928. You can not run a modern mogul locomotive for the money that was sufficient to maintain and operate an old-style wood-burning engine. When legitimate operating expenses fail to show development and growth it will be evidence that something is radically wrong with the Republic.

From now on we can look for steady increase in necessary national expenditures. This, however, does not change Budget policy nor weaken the demand for the strictest economy in Federal operations. Rather that demand is strengthened. With the growth of the country new important projects will present themselves, calling for more money from the Treasury, and no matter how great the revenues, unless they are courageously controlled and wisely directed into channels of useful and necessary purposes, burdensome additional taxes, or inability to carry on necessary constructive work, will result. Certainly we contemplate no such possibility.

And the year 1927, with its record of smallest expenditure and biggest surplus, forms the new starting point for Budget operations. From now on instead of striving each year to reduce expenses below the preceding year we enter upon a new and equally important duty to see that advancing costs are reflected in necessary development and constructive progress.

INCREASING COSTS

Expenditures in 1928 exceeded the 1927 record by $149,935,355.73. This was almost entirely due to new legislation providing for new projects of great national importance. We managed, however, with the aid of a $50,000,000 reduction in interest, to end the year with a surplus of $398,828,281.06. Of this amount, $367,358,710.12 was applied to the debt with an annual interest saving of $14,000,000.

THE PRESENT YEAR

The current year thus far has not been a happy one for the Budget organization. An original estimated surplus of $252,540,283 was by new legislation, including tax reduction, transformed into a threatened deficit of $94,000,000. At the last meeting of this organization in June the President called attention to this radical change in prospects, stated that he nevertheless contemplated no deficit at the end of the year, and called his executives and administrators into action, to work another transformation—to convert that $94,000,000 indicated deficit into an assured surplus. By his direction the expenditure program for the year was radically modified. The pruning knife fell here and there and everywhere in the grim fight for a balanced Budget. Proposed expenditures of doubtful immediate necessity went under the guillotine. Every year since the installation of the Budget system has been a fighting year, but this year we are making the supreme fight of our history.

A man and his wife were brought before the judge for disturbing the peace. In response to the judge's inquiry the man explained:

"It was this-a-way, Jedge. Me and the wife was quarreling over the wash money. She called me a lazy loafer and hit me over the head with a kittle. I knocks her down. Up she comes and knocks me down and kicks me in the neck."

"Well, what then?" asked the judge.

"Well, then we gets mad and starts to fight."

And we have started to fight. We have not had a deficit since the inauguration of the Budget. We think it too late to begin now. We realize the seriousness of the deficit threat, and are calling out all our reserves to meet it. If we fail and June 30 finds the balance on the wrong side of the Treasury ledger we propose that the Federal service be able to say with clear conscience—

"We made an honest fight for a balanced Budget, we husbanded our supplies, we conserved our funds, we made every endeavor to increase our receipts and reduce our expenditures, we have done all we could."

One of the greatest assets of this great Government is the devotion of its personnel to the Federal service and their whole-hearted commitment to the particular projects with which they are charged. It is therefore a radical departure from the usual to call upon these administrators and ask them to modify their plans for the purpose of saving money with which to balance the National Budget. The quite general ready and sympathetic response to the President's appeal emphasizes the splendid morale of the service and shows its realization that the importance of a balanced budget outweighs the importance of their especial projects.

One able Federal administrator who disburses millions was greatly concerned when it was suggested that he reduce his spending program by a considerable amount. Said he, "If I reduce my expenditures by that amount it will seriously interfere with my plans. What am I going to do?" He was told the story of the woman on an Atlantic steamship. The sea got a little rough and she sent for the colored steward.

"What am I going to do if I am taken sick?" she asked.

Said the steward, "Lady, it's no use telling you what you'se goin' to do if you'se taken sick. You'se goin' to do it anyhow."

The money is being saved!

As a result of this drastic action and an improvement in the revenue outlook, the Budget for 1930 as submitted to Congress showed a possible surplus for the current year of $36,990,192. And while the flush of victory still mantled our cheeks unexpected and unheralded demands rudely wiped out our $37,000,000 surplus and put in its place an apparent deficit of about the same amount. But we are still fighting.

THE FEDERAL CASUALTY CLUB

We haven't organized a new service club since the advent of the much-discussed Woodpecker Club. The time is ripe and need urgent for the installation of a new saving organization, and so I present for your approval the Federal Casualty Club. To acquire membership you will from now on up to and including June 30 next let all vacancies remain unfilled, thereby contributing toward a balanced budget the far from negligible sum of $12,500,000. This does not contemplate the withholding of promotions. It directs itself only to the filling of vacancies by new appointments.

The Bureau of the Budget makes first application for membership.

And I am confident this can be done without much trouble or sacrifice. You should take for your model the member of the country band which was returning on a midnight train from a celebration in a neighboring town. The train conductor asked one of the somewhat inebriated members of the organization for his ticket. The man said he had lost it. The conductor said:

"Oh, no, my man; you couldn't do that. You couldn't lose your ticket."

"I couldn't lose my ticket?" replied the man, in an aggrieved tone of voice: "I've lost the bass drum."

You have accomplished much more difficult things than the one you are now asked to do—to save us that $12,500,000.

SURGICAL WORK ON ESTIMATES

The estimates sent to Congress for 1930 call for $280,777,617.33 less than the departments originally asked. Cuts in estimates made by the Budget Bureau during the entire Budget period—reductions made by direction of the President before submission to Congress—totaled $1,961,681,076.49. This, however, does not tell the whole story, for Budget boards organized in the various departments take their toll before the estimates are sent to the Budget Bureau. The Treasury Department Budget Board, for example, reduced estimates by $61,325,085.54, while the War Department authorities shaved $590,560,046 from estimates before sending them to the Bureau of the Budget. Exclusive of reductions made by other Budget boards, we have a total reduction under Budget procedure of $2,613,766,207.54. These major operations were not performed without protests and prophecies of dire calamity as a result of such reductions. But the disasters and fatalities predicted have not materialized, and we have to-day a more efficient organization than ever before. Many plants thrive with pruning, and the Federal plant seems to be one of them.

The estimates for 1930 show a possible surplus of $60,576,182. This result is reached without figuring into the equation pending legislation and possible court action that may add millions to our expenditures and seriously threaten that narrow safety margin of $60,000,000. Facing these conditions, the President stated that no estimates would meet with his approval that would contribute to a deficit in 1930. Appeals for funds must be confined to purposes of such supreme importance and urgency as would obviously warrant the risk of jeopardizing the 1930 balance. From a Budget standpoint no other course is possible, and supplemental estimates are having a hard time. Proponents of these supplementals urge that their needs, as voiced in their estimates, meet in full these requirements of importance and urgency.

The members of a certain denomination decided to remodel the church. Appeal was made to one of the members to contribute toward the building fund. He demurred, saying he owed a great deal of money to various people in the town and could not afford to contribute. "Don't you owe the Lord something?" asked one of the soliciting committee. "Yes; I s'pose I do," was the frank reply; "but He ain't pressing me like these others are."

We try in reviewing estimates to decide on the merits of each case and not allow ourselves to be convinced by the eloquence shown or the pressure applied by the advocates of particular projects. Some of the Federal representatives are gifted above others in the advocacy of their wants. It is the duty of the Budget Bureau to see that priority of merit is recognized irrespective of the strength or weakness of the presentation.

THE NATION'S DEBT

We still have a national debt. While we are committed to its reduction and final extinction we will miss it in a way when it is gone for it stands as a constant, eloquent appeal for economy in operation. Its consistent reduction is a measure in a large way of the effectiveness of our administration. Every dollar whittled from its all too magnificent proportions is a tribute to thrift in government.

The books of the Treasury August 31, 1919, showed a gross national debt of $26,596,701,648.01. By application of the various surpluses of the years 1920 to 1928, amounting to $3,091,000,000, through the operations of the cumulative sinking fund act, by foreign payments, the brilliant refunding operations of the Treasury Department, and other factors, on June 30 last that crushing total was reduced to $17,604,293,201.43. This gave us an actual reduction in a little less than nine years of $8,922,408,446.58—an average reduction over a period of nine year of $1,000,000,000 a year. Could anything be more eloquent of the stability of our great Government and the wisdom that has governed its administration?

We are committed to the important task of bringing that debt balance down to $15,000,000,000 in three years. From July 1 to December 31 last, the debt was reduced by $290,000,000, which means an annual saving of $11,000,000 in interest.

THE DEPENDABLE TREASURY

The more I see of our great Treasury Department the more I am impressed with the punctilious care with which it watches over even pennies and fractions of pennies. This same great care governs all its procedures, which are never modified until every last shadow of doubt as to the wisdom of such modification is removed. I read of the clerk of a western town who might well have served an apprenticeship in the Treasury Department. He was noted for the accuracy and completeness of his records. One evening while the town council was in session an earthquake rudely shook the townhouse. The council abandoned the shaking building in fear and haste. The clerk, however, remained, and true to form closed the record of the session with these words, "On motion of the townhouse the council adjourned."

While we may in this facetious way speak of the Treasury and its devotion to established procedures, we must admit that its methods are safe and sound. During the World War while we were concerned as to the draft, worried about the construction of cantonments, troubled regarding supplies, and fearful about transportation, we never gave anxious thought to the Treasury. Facing financial demands of a magnitude never before known, confronted with financial problems of the most extraordinary character, it stood like a Gibraltar, weathering every storm. All honor to those worthies who through the years have so ably carried on this great activity, and on the roll of honor we give high place to those who through the World War and since have so admirably administered its great interests.

PROTECTING THE TREASURY

There are hundreds of live, active organizations, created for the purpose of getting money out of the Federal Treasury. The Budget Bureau is an organization created and set apart by Congress for the defense of the Treasury. In the fight for protection of the taxpayers' money we meet always well organized, amply financed opposition. The Budget Director, as the President's representative, is almost overwhelmed at times with floods of letters, telegrams, personal appeals, and pressure of various kinds for favorable recommendation to the President for funds from the Treasury for purposes which he, with his impartial view of the entire field of Federal operation, knows should not be approved. If ever the Budget is set aside through the efforts of its enemies, and they are many, some one should tell to the beneficiaries of the Budget, whose name is legion, the story of the colored worker in a southern cotton field on a sweltering day in August, who, pointing an accusing finger at the sun blazing in scorching splendor overhead, asked complainingly, "Where was you last January, when I needed you so bad?"

FEDERAL WOODPECKERS

In June, 1927, the Loyal Order of Woodpeckers was organized in the Federal service to give the thousands of Federal workers a definite place in the campaign for thrift. To become a member a saving of at least $1 a year must be made. With 568,715 employees there could be effected a saving of more than a half-million dollars a year, and that seemed worth trying. Of course, the more important purpose was the development of the spirit of conservation of Government money, time, and supplies. The proposal met with loyal response from the service.

That this woodpecker idea is contagious is shown by a letter from a citizen of Waco, Tex., who learned of the project over the radio from this auditorium. He asked for more details, saying he planned to organize one of the clubs in the plant where he is employed. I quote from his letter:

"As business is rather poor just now and expenses are rather high, it seems to be necessary to assist my company in every way possible to cut the cost and increase production, and in so doing I realize we shall all benefit."

Fortunate the business that has men of this type on its pay roll.

I have an illustration for the especial benefit of those critics who can see in a Budget report a few cents saved on pencils, which they ridicule, and fail to notice a saving in that same report of $384,000,000 under our general reserve policy.

The Interior Department circularized its employees urging them to enlist in the Woodpecker Club and pledge themselves to make a specific saving during the year of at least $1. I read from a letter sent to the district superintendent by a clerk at an Indian agency in Oklahoma. The letter was a response to the department circular:

"From the appropriation for lights and fuel I have saved at least $1 * * * by sitting by the open fire in the evening with the lights turned out except when reading. * * * Through an open window my kitchen light shines into a mirror on my bathroom wall, which in turn reflects the light onto the white wall opposite and illuminates the entire bathroom."

And you smile. I did when I first read it. Then I pictured that lone Federal worker, on an Indian reservation, in far-distant Oklahoma, with little opportunity to save, studying to make his contribution to Federal economy and efficiency. And I smiled no longer. Spanning the prairies, crossing the rivers, and singing its way across the great open spaces, that subdued but penetrating note of economy that pulses through every phase of Federal activity, sounding clear and full in the remotest parts of the globe wherever the flag flies, found a responsive echo in the thought and consciousness of this loyal worker at one of the Nation's outposts.

"Through an open window my kitchen light shines into a mirror on my bathroom wall, which in turn reflects the light onto the white wall opposite and illuminates the entire bathroom."

Fortunate the Government that has men of that type on its pay roll. If that crusading spirit could possess the entire service, what a staggering record of saving we could make. Thank God there's no degree of merit in honest service. The charwoman who conserves Federal soap at the expense of her elbow in the interest of saving is entitled to the same medal for service as he who saves millions.

Mr. President, at the Federal business meeting held in this hall June 30, 1924, you made this declaration:

"I am for economy. After that I am for more economy. At this time and under present conditions that is my conception of serving all the people."

Here is the inspiration of our great thrift crusade—not merely to save money, but to save people. We had tried to substitute "to save" for "to spend." It had seemed a dreary, drab program, but you, Mr. President, vitalized it, and gave it human interest. From a cold, impersonal thing economy became a matter of the most intense personal interest, not only to the people in the service, but to the people of the country who gave to your policy of saving their enthusiastic approval. A miracle was wrought in the minds of the many, and thrift became more nearly than ever before the habit of the Nation. As a result of the policy, taxes were reduced and something more of hope and comfort and contentment brought into the homes of the people. Joaquin Miller has a new and I believe truer conception of that often misapplied word "hero":

"The hero we love in this land of to-day
Is the hero who lightens some fellowman's load—
Who makes of the mountain some pleasant highway,
Who makes of the desert some blossom-sown road."

This you have done, Mr. President. The interest of the taxpayer and the well-being and happiness of more than 120,000,000 of people are inseparably bound up in this policy of saving. Thrift has won for itself a permanent and prominent place in Federal administration. To you the everlasting credit, to you the gratitude of the people of the country, and to you the respect and appreciation of the Federal service.

SENATE

THURSDAY, January 31, 1929

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who hearest prayer, to whom all flesh shall come, satisfy us early with Thy mercy, for Thou hast taught us that ere our yearning has broken into speech Thou hearest us, that no secret sigh of discontent escapes Thy listening ear. Give to us an humble heart wherein we may enshrine the Infinite, and save us from the presumption that prides itself on knowledge not our own or fails to recognize the gifts Thy bounty yields. Reveal Thyself not only in this mystic hour but in all our strivings for the Nation's good, that we may be like those noble souls of other days who bore aloft the torch of truth, who from the mountain tops of vision heralded the coming day, and in the darkened valleys failed not to lift unto the hills of help the eyes of fellow men. Hear us and bless us for the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. CURTIS presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

House Concurrent Resolution 9, relating to tariff on livestock and livestock products

Whereas since the present foot-and-mouth embargo against importation of meat animals and meat products from South American countries into the United States demonstrates the beneficial effect of protection to our American livestock producers and is evidence of the necessity of an increased tariff duty on meat and meat animals; and

Whereas in order to protect livestock producers of the United States against the importation of all meat animals and meat products from low-cost production countries it is most urgent that Congress place hides on the dutiable list and increase present tariff duties on all meat animals and meat products at once: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas (the Senate concurring therein), That we respectfully petition the Ways and Means Committee of Congress of the United States, at this time considering tariff schedules relating to agriculture, livestock, and livestock products, to place a tariff duty of at least 6 cents per pound on hides and increase the present tariff duty on meat and meat animals at least 200 per cent; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be engrossed by the secretary of the Senate and the chief clerk of the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas, and signed by the lieutenant governor and speaker of the house of representatives, and copies thereof transmitted to each member of the Kansas delegation in the National Congress.

I hereby certify that the above concurrent resolution originated in the house and passed that body.

RESCUES BY UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD VESSELS

Mr. GOFF. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce a report from the United States Shipping Board showing the rescues at sea in recent years by many United States vessels and especially the recent rescue by the steamship America, under command of Captain Fried.

There being no objection, the report was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEAMEN ON SHIPPING BOARD VESSELS

It has been unjustly charged that the seamen employed on Shipping Board vessels are incompetent.

Your attention is drawn to the record of the crews of Shipping Board vessels who have made heroic rescues at sea. These crews were all supplied by the sea service section of the Shipping Board.

It is obviously unfair to the gallant American seamen employed on these ships to attempt to minimize their efficiency by making statements that they are incompetent after they have proved to the world that they are not only equal to but are even more efficient than foreign seamen, especially when foreign nations have recognized their heroic conduct, devotion to duty, and valor under the most trying conditions in the following well-known disasters at sea:

The rescue of the Italian ship Ignazio Florio by the steamship President Harding on October 19, 1925:

The rescue of the Norwegian ship Elven by the steamship American Trader on October 27, 1925. Steamship American Trader 100 per cent American crew.

The rescue of the Dutch tanker Silvanus by the steamship Topa Topa on April 8, 1926:

Steamship Vincent: Went to assistance of French barkentine Sylvana, transferred in heavy sea provisions and gear and took off injured seamen, October 5, 1928:

Rescue of 84 members of the crew and 41 passengers of the British steamship Vestris by steamship American Shipper on November 12, 1928. Steamship American Shipper 100 per cent American crew.

Steamship McKeesport: Went to assistance of Greek steamship Alexandria which was disabled at sea and towed same to safe harbor, on November 20, 1928. Steamship McKeesport 100 per cent American crew.

Steamship Carlton: Went to assistance of the British steamship Tabora and towed same to safe harbor, November 27, 1928. Steamship Carlton 100 per cent American crew.

Rescue of the crew of the American schooner Jas. W. M. Hall, on December 7, 1928, by the steamship West Ekonk. Steamship West Ekonk 100 per cent American crew.

The latest chapter in this splendid list of rescues was enacted on January 23, 1929, when, in a boisterous sea, 700 miles from shore, 32 members of the crew of the Italian freighter Florida were saved from a watery grave by the United States Shipping Board steamship America, under Capt. George Fried. Of the 79 sailors in the America's deck department, 76 were American citizens and the remaining three had taken out their first papers. The lifeboat crew which performed this heroic feat were all American citizens, placed aboard the ship by the sea service section of the Shipping Board.

The above record speaks for itself and should definitely silence those who seek to impeach the efficiency and gallantry of American seamen placed on Shipping Board vessels by the sea service section.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, in the New York Times of Sunday, the 27th instant, there appeared a very interesting and instructive editorial in support of my bill to create a national institute of health. I ask permission to have the editorial printed in the RECORD, and I respectfully invite the attention of every Senator to it. It is one of the finest on the subject that has been written.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

TEAMWORK OF SCIENCE

Attention was called by our London correspondent to the "teamwork" of the sciences in saving the life of the King. The physician has had the cooperation of the surgeon, the bacteriologist, the biochemist, the physiologist, and the X-ray physicist, and is to have the climatologist's suns, winds, and waters in bringing his royal patient back to health and strength again. It is a striking illustration of what the sciences can do when under unified command. They bring all their forces into the fight for the life of one whose unconquered spirit has itself been a factor in the struggle and victory.

Their success should suggest the importance of keeping these sciences in continuous cooperation everywhere, both in research and in practice. More particularly it should win new support of the bill for the proposed national institute of health which Senator RANSDELL has introduced in the Senate. The purpose is to convoke the aid of all the sciences for "investigation and research in the fundamental problems of the diseases of man" and related matters. At a hearing on this bill a few months ago, Dr. Reid Hunt, of the Harvard Medical School, said that never in the whole history of the world had efforts to improve health conditions been so far behind the advance in other sciences. In the field of chemistry, for example, thousands of new compounds are studied every year to see whether they are useful as dyes and paints, or in photography, or the rubber or automobile industry, but virtually none of them with a view to their possible use in promoting health. Yet, as Dr. William J. Mayo said in a recent address, "Life is largely a matter of chemistry."

It is estimated by Dr. Charles Herty that more than 100,000,000 people suffered from certain sorts of sickness in 1927. This meant an economic loss running up into billions. Such a showing again emphasizes the need of coordinating the sciences in a national effort to prevent diseases that are or may be preventable. The widespread influenza is an especially urgent reason for giving Federal support to such study.

General Gorgas, when asked what he would do with the hygienic laboratory which now exists in case this consolidation of all the health agencies were effected, said that he would make it "a gateway at the entrance to the great national health institute," where scientists might concentrate upon the problems of health. This little building would at the same time show the handicap under which the health service was placed, despite its accomplishments, by the "penury of the citizenship that had failed to realize its real needs."

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article appearing in the Merchant Fleet News of December, 1928, entitled "American Valor on the Seven Seas," and likewise some brief comments which I made on that article and which appear in the Merchant Fleet News for January, 1929.

The article gives a list of accomplishments by American officers and seamen which, I think, ought to be recognized. There should be added, of course, to this list the occurrence which took place since its publication, the great achievement of Captain Fried and Chief Officer Manning, together with the lifeboat crew and other officers and men of the steamship America, in rescuing 32 men from the unfortunate Florida under very distressing circumstances. That achievement marks Captain Fried as an outstanding seaman and establishes his fame and proves the high standard of American seamanship.

There being no objection, the articles referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Merchant Fleet News, December, 1928]

AMERICAN VALOR ON THE SEVEN SEAS

Again the world has been thrilled by the work of American seamen, as it has often been since the days when American clippers ruled the seas. The ill-fated British vessel Vestris radioed its S O S, a call which demands prompt action on the part of every vessel within range of the call, but more especially does the call bring action on American ships. Tradition and instructions call for prompt and efficient action, and a long record of heroic work on the seas proves that always the American vessel has the "know-how" of reaching the point of need and rendering the help required. The steamship American Shipper, of the American Merchant Lines, was over 177 miles from the doomed Vestris, yet instantly it turned from its course and rushed toward the scene of disaster. Captain Cumings knew that other vessels were within 50 miles of the sinking vessel and several were within the 150-mile zone, but trained in American seamanship, the master of the American Shipper headed toward the call for need, as he says in his report: "My idea was to offer medical assistance, care of passengers and crew, and transportation to New York. Serious thought that we might be the ship to pick up the boats and survivors was not entertained." Yet it was Captain Cumings and his crew that picked up 125 of the survivors of the British vessel.

The rescue work of the American Shipper calls to mind a long list of heroic work, the willing risk of life and limb, by American seamen sailing under the Stars and Stripes. From this long list the Merchant Fleet News has selected a few of the later rescues, material in connection with which is at present available.

If these reports seem brief when considered in connection with the thrilling event recorded, bear in mind that men of the sea are by nature modest, and that they consider saving human life at sea, even at the risk of what would seem to be almost certain death, all in a day's work and a part of their job. Such is the modesty of the men in whose veins run the blood of heroes, American seamen with brains.

LIFE-SAVING EXPLOITS

There follows a few of the life-saving exploits of the United States Shipping Board vessels in recent years. Other pages could be added of a score of other exploits in which American seamen rushed to the rescue of life and did it efficiently and with no hope for gain or glory. In American marine services and on the vessels of the United States Navy there is but one idea when an S O S is heard and that is to render immediate service.

STEAMSHIP "WEST ELDARA"

Steamship West Eldara (freight). Master: Capt. A. L. Livingston. While this vessel was en route from Norfolk to Rotterdam and Antwerp on April 19, 1926, at 7.21 p. m. sighted distress signals burning on board the French schooner M. F. Fecamp. The master of the West Eldara immediately changed his course and one-half hour later hove-to alongside the French vessel, put out a small boat, and the mate came on board, informing they were in need of help, that the pumps had been kept going night and day for a week, and there were still 8 feet of water in the hold and the rudder carried away. He was advised that the West Eldara would stand by and take the crew off.

Owing to heavy seas running, it took several hours to effect the transfer of the 36 members of the crew, but after this was accomplished, the West Eldara did not leave until 12.32 on April 20 when it was felt sure the French schooner had settled low in water. A message was broadcasted by radio that this schooner was a menace to navigation, giving her position and condition as last seen.

STEAMSHIP "AMERICAN MERCHANT"

Steamship American Merchant (freight and passenger vessel). Master: Capt. S. F. Cummings. On November 2, 1925, this vessel conveyed the Holland-American steamship Andijk to the Azore Islands, a distance of 370 miles, the steamship Andijk having been bound to Rotterdam with a cargo of grain and encountering extremely heavy weather carrying away her bridge, wheel house, and smashing the wireless house and damaging the boats. Her compasses also were damaged, making her totally unable to make any port. Although this was considered salvage work, it was nevertheless thought a splendid piece of efficient seamanship and navigation on the part of the master of the steamship American Merchant.

STEAMSHIP "CASPER"

Steamship Casper (freight). Master: Capt. H. Bill. While en route from New York to Scandinavian ports in the Baltic sea, sighted the Norwegian motor ship Pinto with a crew of 13 men in distress. The crew of the Pinto was taken aboard the Casper in the morning of the 9th day of February, 1926, and during the transfer of the crew the master of the Pinto was swept overboard from the lifeboat, but was rescued. It appeared that the crew of the Pinto had been without provisions for three days.

A volunteer crew from the Casper manned the Pinto and took it in tow. After towing for several hours, the hawser parted and it became necessary to abandon her hastily. Third Officer K. Helwig, in charge of the volunteer crew was swept overboard from the lifeboat, but was saved by two members of the crew who were hurt in pulling him from the sea.

The Casper abandoned the Pinto and proceeded to Copenhagen with the shipwrecked crew.

STEAMSHIP "AMERICAN TRADER"

Steamship American Trader (freight and passenger vessel). Master: Capt. Hubbar C. Fish. On October 24, 1925, while this vessel was en route from London to New York and bucking a North Atlantic westerly gale, a call of distress was received from the sinking Norwegian steamer Elven, about 170 miles southwestward. Captain Fish immediately swung the vessel about and proceeded at full speed toward the position of the Elven. The sea was tremendous, and it was considered a dangerous maneuver, but was carried through without any damage. After searching throughout the day of the 24th and the night, the sinking vessel was finally located, but due to the tremendous sea and dark night, Captain Fish wisely decided to wait until daylight before attempting a rescue. At 6 a. m. of the 25th, the American Trader approached close to the Elven and rescued her crew, consisting of 32 men, without injury or damage of any kind. The lifeboat crew was in charge of Second Officer Warren A. Woodman, who it is stated, deserves great credit for the skillful manner in which he handled same. At the time the crew was taken from the Elven there was 17 feet of water in the holds, and sinking fast.

STEAMSHIP "PRESIDENT TAFT"

Steamship President Taft (passenger). Master: Capt. G. Y. January. While en route from San Francisco to Yokohama, Japan, via Honolulu, on January 26, 1924, at 2:15 a. m., the vessel received an S O S call from the British steamer Mary Harlock. The President Taft altered her course and proceeded at full speed to the assistance of the Mary Harlock, advising the master at the same time that the crew could be taken off but that the President Taft being a mail and passenger steamer could not stand by. The Mary Harlock advised they were not prepared to abandon the ship but wanted a vessel to stand by.

At 8.45 a. m., a radio from the Mary Harlock showed that she was in a serious predicament.

The President Taft again altered her course and proceeded to the Mary Harlock, circling the Mary Harlock four complete times and at the same time pumped oil overboard before a chance was taken to lower a lifeboat from the President Taft. The weather was westerly gale with wind at times of hurricane force and exceptionally high sea, which did considerable minor damage on foredeck of the President Taft.

However, an oil slick was formed and the steamship Mary Harlock managed to lower her lee lifeboat and was picked up at 5 p. m. by the President Taft. In the meantime the chief officer and 6 men of the President Taft manned a lifeboat of the Mary Harlock (the lee lifeboat mentioned above) and returned to the Mary Harlock picking up the remaining of the crew consisting of 12 men who were unable to get into the lifeboat on the first trip. At 5.53 p. m. the crew of 38 men were safely aboard the President Taft and this vessel was on its way to Yokohama, leaving the Mary Harlock a floating derelict, of which fact a radio was broadcast as a warning to all vessels in the Pacific. In consequence of this rescue, the President Taft arrived two days late at Yokohamo.

The master of the Mary Harlock expressed his sincere thanks for the prompt way in which the President Taft proceeded to his assistance.

STEAMSHIP "MEANTICUT"

Steamship Meanticut (freight vessel). Master: Capt. S. C. Wallace, on September 28, 1926, while this vessel was in latitude 24.15 longitude 81.20, en route from New Orleans to France, rescued three men from the motor boat Shia Wasse, in a sinking condition.

STEAMSHIP "AQUARIUS"

Steamship Aquarius (freight vessel). Capt. William H. Stone, master. This vessel sailed from Hamburg, Germany, for New Orleans, via Tampa, on the 27th day of May, 1927, and at 7.30 p. m., on May 30, picked up 14 men from 2 lifeboats belonging to the French 4-masted schooner Boree, of Nantes. The schooner was abandoned in a sinking condition in latitude 47.51 north, longitude 9.58 west. The wind was east, blowing hard and raining, with a rough high sea. The steamship Aquarius proceeded to Horta, Azores, where the rescued men were landed, two of which were injured.

STEAMSHIP "SACANDAGA"

Steamship Sacandaga (freight). Master: Capt. G. D. Sterling. While this vessel was en route from Charleston, S. C., to London, England, on June 8, 1925, sighted a Spanish balloon Hesperio at 7.15 a. m. The balloon was headed down the English Channel toward the Atlantic Ocean, and as it was nearing the Sacandaga the pilot was heard calling for help. Immediately the Sacandaga altered her course and proceeded toward the balloon, which was making about 7 knots before the wind with drag in water. At 7.50 a. m. the balloon was overtaken and while the Sacandaga was maneuvering in a position to leeward in order that the balloon could drift down toward their port side it struck the port side of the vessel just aft of the smokestack with a crew standing by to take the pilots aboard. At the time the pilot was releasing the gas in the bag and, owing to bag being so close to the smokestack, the heat of same caused the gas to ignite, burning up the bag and setting fire to the boat deck of the Sacandaga and burning three members of the crew. Their injuries, however, were slight. The basket of the balloon was submerged beneath the water, holding one pilot with his feet caught in the net of the balloon and his body submerged to his shoulders. Seaman George Cooper dove in the water and cut the net free from the pilot's feet, who was assisted up a sea ladder by two other members of the crew. The crew consisted of two pilots, one of which had already boarded the Sacandaga without any difficulty.

The two pilots, who were lieutenants of the Spanish Royal Navy, were piloting the Hesperio in the Gordon-Bennett race, and as they had lost the greater part of their clothes and were wet, they were given dry clothes and treated in every respect to the best ability of the master until they were safely landed in London and turned over to the Spanish Naval Commissioner at 64 Victoria Street.

STEAMSHIP "HASTINGS"

Steamship Hastings (freight). Master: Capt. I. Hystad. This vessel while on voyage from Gulf port to Hamburg, Germany, on November 11, 1926, when about 15 miles west of Bimini Island, sighted a motor boat adrift, flying signals, and carrying two men, requesting to be towed to Fowey Rock Light, as the rudder was gone and engine disabled. The steamship Hastings passed them a line and gave them an oar with which to steer, and started ahead at half speed. Weather conditions prevented towage with safety, and at 12.15 p. m. the towline parted. The men in the launch asked to be taken off; hoisted boat on board and taken to destination.

STEAMSHIP "BIBBCO"

Steamship Bibbco (freight). Master: Capt. Bert U. Heald. On June 14, 1926, this vessel while en route to Montevideo from Mobile took on board from the disabled Italian steamship Elipoli 29 members of its crew about 70 miles northeastward of Cape Polonio, S. A.

The Italian vessel sunk two hours later. Capt. Jose Schiaffino, commanding the Italian ship, was warm in praise of the rescue effected by the steamship Bibbco.

STEAMSHIP "PRESIDENT M'KINLEY"

Steamship President McKinley (passenger). Master: Capt. Alvin Lustie. While this vessel was en route from Victoria, British Columbia, to Yokohama, Japan, she received S O S message at 6 p. m., January 3, 1924, from the Japanese vessel Kyosei Maru in latitude 49.41 N. longitude 174.10 E., requesting immediate assistance. The President McKinley was then about 300 miles away from this vessel and advised the Kyosei Maru it was proceeding to assist. At 11 a. m. of the 4th the master of the Kyosei Maru radioed that the ship was going to be abandoned and required assistance in a hurry, 47 persons aboard. The weather conditions were very unfavorable, heavy snow squalls were passing at frequent intervals, and at 1.20 p. m. of the 4th, the Kyosei Maru was sighted on the edge of a heavy snow squall, then lost entirely for about 20 minutes, and again sighted.

It appeared that the Japanese vessel was steaming away steadily to to the eastward at a rate of 8 to 10 knots an hour, and it took the President McKinley an hour to finally overtake her. The master of the Kyosei Maru then advised the master of the President McKinley he was sailing 3 knots, and requested him to follow until the following morning, as he would endeavor to keep within this speed, for he considered it dangerous to steam under less speed. The maneuvering placed the master of the President McKinley in a rather embarrassing position, and as he had passengers and mail aboard and was operating on schedule time and was getting short of fuel and fresh water.

About 4 a. m. of the 5th, the master of the Kyosei Maru decided to abandon the ship as the barometer was falling. At 7.20 a. m., the last of the crew of the Japanese vessel was taken off and landed aboard the President McKinley without accident to anyone.

As a heavy sea was running, it was imposible to hoist the lifeboat, and after all gear was salvaged from it, the boat was cast adrift, and the President McKinley proceeded on her voyage, after a delay of approximately 33 hours and running an extra distance of 217 miles.

All ships were warned by the President McKinley that the Japanese steamer was derelict and a danger to navigation.

STEAMSHIP "TOPA TOPA"

Steamship Topa Topa (freight). Master: Capt. B. A. Bostleman. While this vessel was proceeding down river below N. O. on April 8, 1926, witnessed collision between Dutch tanker Silvanus and American tanker W. H. Wheeler. The steamship Silvanus was loaded with benzine and became one mass of flames. The master of the steamship Topa Topa swung ship around and approached the Silvanus as near as possible, lowering three lifeboats which picked up Asiatics (members of crew and captain). The lifeboats made two trips to try and find other members of crew but were unsuccessful. Captain Bostleman paid special tribute to Third Officer L. J. Bogan, who began service in the rescue at 8.25 p. m. and continued to 11.25 p. m.

STEAMSHIP "EMERGENCY AID"

Steamship Emergency Aid (freight vessel). Master: Capt. Malcolm Cameron. While en route from New Orleans to Rotterdam, Holland, in latitude 25.23 north, 80.26 longitude west, on November 3, 1924, at 6.30 a. m. sighted the Cuban schooner Jubilee in distress. A lifeboat was launched from the steamship Emergency Aid and the crew of the Cuban schooner was taken safely aboard, the Emergency Aid proceeding toward Key West. On November 4, 1924, the crew of the Jubilee was placed aboard the Coast Guard cutter Bayspring, after which the steamship Emergency Aid proceeded on her voyage to Europe.

STEAMSHIP "PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT"

Steamship President Roosevelt (passenger). Master: Capt. George Fried. Voyage 41, eastbound; sailed from New York January 20, 1926, and at 5.40 a. m. of the 24th received an S O S from the British steamship Antinoe. The President Roosevelt arrived alongside the Antinoe at noon, same date, wind west, force 10, violent snow squalls, high rough sea, and began pumping oil overboard with excellent effect, the master of the Antinoe claiming that this saved his vessel from sinking.

At 9 p. m., during heavy snow squalls, the President Roosevelt lost sight of the Antinoe, whose radio and dynamo were out of commission, but picked it up again at 3.40 p. m. of the 25th, with her engine and foreroom flooded and No. 3 hatch broken. The vessel also had a heavy list to starboard.

The weather moderated, and an attempt was made by the President Roosevelt to send a manned lifeboat. While lowering the boat a vicious hail squall hit the vessels, making the sea too rough for lifeboat, and spilling out the crew, who managed to get back into the boat, covered with fuel oil and apparently exhausted. The lifeboat crew were ordered aboard the President Roosevelt, with the exception of two men who were lost overboard. Every effort was made to rescue these men, but, due to darkness and hail squalls, this was impossible.

On the 26th, as the Antinoe's distress signals indicated a perilous situation, the President Roosevelt attempted to float a boat by aid of Lyle gun; this did not prove successful and they tried to float a cask, which also failed.

On the 27th another attempt to float a boat to the Antinoe with end of line leading from top to after-king-post failed and was lost. The Lyle gun was fired 16 times, but carried away near projectile frequently. Colonel Hearn, artillery expert, a passenger, suggested using a spiral spring between projectiles and line, which was successful. Chief Engineer Turner had made 13 projectiles.

At 7.20 p. m. of the 27th the Roosevelt was successful in rescuing 12 men from the Antinoe in a lifeboat, which was so badly damaged was cut adrift after the crew was safely aboard.

At midnight the remainder of the crew of the Antinoe was rescued. The master had to be carried aboard and his crew were in a pitiful condition, due to exposure, lack of food and water for two days, and little clothing.

On January 28 the President Roosevelt proceeded on her voyage, leaving the Antinoe still floating, with both decks awash and 50° starboard list. Having stood by the Antinoe for three and one-half days, the crew almost exhausted from long vigil.

STEAMSHIP "OGONTZ"

Steamship Ogontz (freight vessel). Master: Capt. W. B. Zechel. While this vessel was en route from Galveston to Barcelona, Spain, on January 15, 1926, rescued master and crew of the Newland schooner, Spence Lake, in latitude 36.57 N., longitude 41 W. The six men would have lost their lives had not the steamship Ogontz rescued them.

STEAMSHIP "KENOWIS"

Steamship Kenowis (freight vessel). Master: Capt. W. P. Humphrey. This vessel, while en route from Antwerp to New York, on January 10, 1925, rescued the crew of the Portuguese schooner, Manuel Caragol. It appears that at 4.05 in the morning of this date a white flare-up light was sighted and the course of the Kenowis was altered toward the Manuel Caragol, which was bound from Montevideo to Philadelphia, 150 days out, water-logged, and without provisions. Sixteen men, including the master and their personal effects, were taken aboard the steamship Kenowis. The master of the Portugese schooner was in a feeble condition, due to lack of food and to his having three broken ribs.

The schooner had over 15 feet of water in her hold, which was gaining fast, as the crew was so weak from lack of food that they could hardly man the pumps. It seems that the 11 of the last 15 days before being rescued the crew had one sea biscuit apiece, and for the last 4 days nothing at all. The only water was what rain water they were able to catch.

Everything for their possible comfort was done by the crew of the Kenowis.

STEAMSHIP "PRESIDENT HARDING"

Steamship President Harding (passenger). Master: Capt. Paul Grening. On October 19, 1925, while on voyage 37, westbound, from Bremerhaven, Germany, responded at 10.34 a. m. to the S O S calls of the Italian Ignazio Florio, which vessel was in latitude 49.55 N., longitude 38.16 W. The weather at the time was west-southwest winds of terrific force and mountainous seas. At 9.50 a. m., on the 20th, the President Harding arrived alongside the Ignazio Florio, whose master advised that he wished to abandon the ship and that the chief officer had broken his foot, the second officer lost overboard, and no boats remained intact.

The President Harding discharged fuel overboard and sent boat on line to the Ignazio Florio, which vessel seemed to be in danger of capsizing. The President Harding lost two lifeboats in the attempt to rescue the crew at this time. As weather was so rough, the rescue of the Italian crew of 27 was not effected until the morning of the 21st. The Ignazio Florio was left in a sinking condition.

STEAMSHIP "SPRINGFIELD"

Steamship Springfield (freight). Master: Capt. M. J. Myers. While en route from Hamburg to Savannah on December 23, 1924, at 6.30 a. m., sighted distress rockets from the British brigantine Thames, of Fowey, England, which vessel was on a voyage from Brixham, England, to Savona, Italy, with 280 tons of china clay.

Assistance was requested by the master of the Thames, as the vessel was leaking badly and in a sinking condition and had to be abandoned. The Springfield stood by waiting for the weather to moderate. At 1.30 p. m. of the 23d, as the weather did not improve, a lifeboat was launched from the Springfield and proceeded to the sinking vessel. The crew of seven men were finally successfully rescued under difficult circumstances, as it was expected that the Thames would founder at any moment, and the service rendered was considered a particularly meritorious one. Before launching the lifeboat an attempt was made to float a lifebuoy with message to the Thames, using Lyle gun.

The seven shipwrecked mariners who were landed at Ponta del Gada, Azores, were liberal and sincere in their praise and gratitude for the master and crew of the Springfield.

STEAMSHIP "WEST HARCUVAR"

Steamship West Harcuvar (freight). Master: Capt. L. F. McLain. While en route from European ports to Boston, this vessel rescued crew of four men from French schooner Muguet and brought them to Boston, where they were landed February 16, 1926. (See article in November issue of the Merchant Fleet News.)

STEAMSHIP "REPUBLIC"

Steamship Republic (passenger). Master: Capt. A. B. Randal. On October 26, 1920, this vessel rescued crew of U. S. Coast Guard patrol boat 134 during heavy weather, 7 miles, 31° from Nantucket Shoals, L. V. The master of the Republic maneuvered his vessel in a proper position and pumped overboard about 8 tons of fuel oil to make an oil slick to enable him to make the rescue, thus preventing the seas from breaking. The crew of Coast Guard patrol boat arrived aboard the Republic in a physically exhausted condition.

STEAMSHIP "M'KEESPORT"

The latest rescue made by a United States Shipping Board vessel was made by the steamship McKeesport on November 20, 1928.

[From Merchant Fleet News, January, 1929]

By Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER

The Merchant Fleet News of December, 1928, pages 6–10, gives instances of "American Valor on the Seven Seas," which deserves more than passing notice.

You do well to collect and perpetuate these occurrences and illustrations.

The record ought to be preserved in permanent form, so that examples like these of heroism on the high seas, in most difficult circumstances and under most trying conditions, may inspire all those who "go down to the sea in ships" to meet the supreme test.

These examples show forth not only the courage required, but the skill expected. The former is mainly inborn, the latter the result of proper training. Both are essential where disaster is confronted.

There is a brilliant record, showing seamanship of the highest order, demonstrating that courage and skill characterize American officers and seamen to-day as in the past. They guarantee to America the sea power we need if we but supply the ships. They give public confidence in efficient operation. They assure the traveler and the shipper that here in the officers and men their competency and their faithfulness is the strongest and surest guaranty of safety at sea.

When the ambulance call of the ocean lane flashes through the air the ship should be prepared to meet the demand, but in any case the highest courage, the ablest seamanship it is possible to command are summoned by humanity.

I must lift my hat to the brave radio operators, beginning with Jack Binns, when the Republic and the Florida were in collision some dozen years ago.

The operator on the Titanic in 1912 was of the right sort. I asked him why he did not take to the last lifeboat, and he said, "The captain ordered me to remain at my post, and I did so, going with the ship as she went down by the bow." The Carpathia had gotten his call, now the S O S, and Capt. Arthur Rostron's liner exhibited marked gallantry aboard in the rescue work. He is now Sir Arthur.

The operator on the Vestris gave an equally creditable demonstration of coolness and courage.

The record, however, aboard the Vestris generally is condemned by the figures:

"Loss of life: 27 women, 77 per cent; 21 children, 100 per cent.

"It is scarcely worth while to go further and add: Loss of passengers, 54 per cent; loss of crew, 12 per cent; total, 64 men."

The deeds, the achievements, which you recite, can not be excelled in the history of sea experience.

It is this standard we can hope to maintain among American officers and seamen.

CHANGE OF RULES—OPEN EXECUTIVE SESSIONS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to call up a resolution that is on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution (S. Res. 309) submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] on the 28th instant, proposing to amend Rule XXXVIII so as to provide for the consideration of certain nominations in open executive session. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may we have the resolution read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 309), as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XXXVIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to proceedings on nominations in executive session, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding an additional paragraph, as follows:

"7. Hereafter nominations shall be considered in open executive session unless the Senate, in closed executive session, shall by a two-thirds vote determine that any particular nomination shall be considered in closed executive session, and in that case paragraph 2 of this rule shall apply to such nomination and its consideration."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, has there been any agreement with reference to sending the resolution to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. CURTIS. There is no such agreement. After the Senator from Washington shall have concluded his remarks, I intend to move that it shall be referred to that committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Washington raise an objection to the resolution going to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary for me to discuss the resolution at length. I am rather inclined to think that every Senator has his convictions with reference to the matter.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Washington begins his argument, I should like to suggest to him that I favor his proposed amendment to the rules, but I think there ought to be some plan adopted by which votes taken in secret executive session could by a majority vote be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD after the proceedings in secret session had been concluded. I think that by a majority vote the roll call upon the confirmation of whatever the matter might be should be so published; either that or that each Senator might be permitted to state in open session how he had voted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, that is an entirely different matter from the proposition involved in my proposed amendment of the rule. It may very well be dealt with by a separate amendment or, of course, my proposal is subject to amendment, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Washington proposes in his amendment that by a two-thirds vote in executive session the Senate may decide whether it shall proceed in open session or in secret session. What I am suggesting is if the Senate votes to remain in secret executive session, that after the discussion in secret session shall have been concluded and a vote had the Senate may then by a majority vote order the roll call printed in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. That, of course, is a matter the Senate might consider.

Mr. President, the text of the rule as now framed has been discussed many times and different questions have arisen in regard to it. During my service in the Senate running over a good many years I do not think there has been any important nomination considered in executive session but what in effect after the debate was over the news got out, sometimes in a garbled form, oftentimes in a form that was decidedly unfair and unjust to some Senators and probably truthful with reference to others. It seems to me that that should be avoided.

It is true—and I think this is clear to everyone—that some Senators do not consider the rule as binding on them with reference to matters of this kind; especially they do not consider that paragraph 4 of Rule XXXVII is binding or to be observed by a Senator if he does not desire to do it. That paragraph reads as follows:

> 4. Any Senator or officer of the Senate who shall disclose the secret or confidential business or proceedings of the Senate shall be liable, if a Senator, to suffer expulsion from the body; and if an officer, to dismissal from the service of the Senate and to punishment for contempt.

Mr. President, that paragraph has never been invoked; there has been no suggestion of invoking it, except that it has been read from time to time. There have been suggestions made that information which has been given out in a manner clearly contrary to the rules of the Senate has been given out by employees of the Senate. I want to say that, in my judgment, whatever information has gotten out has not gotten out through the employees of the Senate. I believe that the employees of the Senate who are present in the discharge of their duties in executive sessions have just as much regard for the rules of the Senate as has any Member of the Senate, and I do not believe that any employee has ever given out such information.

There has been considerable newspaper comment and comment among Senators with reference to a very recent occurrence in regard to this matter. I am satisfied that no employee of the Senate gave out information upon which were based the newspaper reports purporting to give a correct statement as to the vote of Senators upon a recent nomination. I do not know that any Senator has given out information—or, at least, direct information. I have heard of suggestions that newspaper men approached Senators and asked certain questions, apparently innocent in themselves, and probably from answers that may have been given they drew their conclusions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is not the crux of what the Senator desires to express simply to have the business of the public conducted in public? I want to say that I am heartily in favor of the Senator's position. I think that all public business, unless it shall be something very special, should be considered in the open, though I think it is proper to incorporate in the proposed amendment, as the Senator has done, the provision that a two-thirds majority may order a question to be considered in secret session. Of course, I can imagine a case where a question ought to be considered in secret session, but it ought to be done only when a majority of two-thirds of the Senate believes it should be done.

I entirely indorse the Senator's proposed amendment to the rules. I am in favor of conducting all of the public's business under the light of pitiless publicity. The time has long since passed when we should conduct the public's business secretly or privately.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in the last 20 years I do not remember a single nomination which has been considered in executive session where charges have been made or accusations have been submitted that such nomination could not just as well have been considered in open session as in executive session. I do not know of any nomination upon which I have voted that I would have had any hesitation whatever in having my vote made public; and I think that is true of other Senators. I can, of course, imagine cases where it is possible it would be far wiser to consider a question in executive session; but any such cases as that are exceptional and not the general rule, as I think has been demonstrated by the nominations which have been submitted to the Senate and acted upon by it.

It is largely in view of that situation and largely in view of the unfair criticisms and unfair suggestions which are made, and the unjust attitude in which Senators are often placed under the rule as it is now that I have been led to suggest this amendment to the rule.

Senators no doubt have read the provisions of the proposed amendment to the rule. I am merely going to call attention to them briefly.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before the Senator does that let me make a suggestion to him. He has been here a long time and is a very fair man. What does the Senator think a Senator should tell a newspaper man when an executive session is over and when he is asked the direct question, "Did you vote for this man's confirmation or against it?"

Mr. JONES. I think, under the rules as we have them, he should say, "I can give you no information as to what took place in executive session." That has always been the rule I myself have followed, and I think that any other course is in violation of the rules. It is to avoid that very situation largely that I have presented this proposed change.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, suppose the newspaper man should say, "Then, I take it that you voted for confirmation."

Mr. JONES. I should simply say to him, "I can give you no information as to what took place in the Senate in executive session." Of course, the newspaper men would probably draw all sorts of conclusions and probably very unfair and unjust conclusions, but, of course, we can not prevent them doing that.

Mr. HEFLIN. It may be that the information or misinformation which that newspaper man would give out would hurt that Senator with his people at home.

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. And put him in a bad light.

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. And might put him in just the opposite position to that which he took in the secret session.

Mr. JONES. It is to avoid those things that I am proposing this resolution to amend the rule, because, as I have said, when we have solemn rules which have been adopted by the Senate I take it that they are just as binding upon a Senator as is a legislative enactment, so long as they stand as the rules of the body of which he is a Member.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will ask the Senator another question. Suppose a Senator goes home and while discussing political issues somebody in his audience asks him how he voted on a certain question considered in executive session; what then does the Senator think should be the Senator's answer?

Mr. JONES. My answer would be, "I can not say, because I am bound by the rules of the body of which I am a Member, and so long as those rules are the rules of that body I feel that I have to observe them, no matter what the consequences may be to myself." It is to avoid that situation that I am proposing this amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am in hearty agreement with the Senator, but I think that in a case such as that the people who send a man here to represent them are entitled to know what he is doing and what he is saying and how he is voting. They are the sovereign power; they are the power that sends him here, and I think he has a right to tell them how he voted.

Mr. JONES. I do not think so under the rules as they now are.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator from Washington that I think he has put the proper construction on the rules, and, as he knows, the one that I have always put on them; I think he is right; but the amendment which he proposes to the rules will not relieve a Senator from the position in which he would place himself in the situation suggested by the Senator from Alabama. Under the proposed amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington to the rule, assuming that two-thirds of the Senate should vote to remain in secret session, then a Senator would be bound; he could not answer the question so as to give any information even in a situation such as that illustrated by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. While the rule as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Washington would be a great improvement, yet, assuming that the Senator's construction and mine are right, it would close a Senator's mouth and prevent him telling either his constituents or anybody else how he voted in executive session when two-thirds of the Senators had decided that the session should be secret. When the Senator from Washington concludes, if I can get the floor, I propose to offer an amendment to his resolution that will meet the point suggested in the questions of the Senator from Alabama, which I think are very important.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. Just a moment; I should like to say a few words further at this point. Personally I am in hearty accord with the views of the Senator from Nebraska. I can not imagine a case coming up in the Senate which should be considered in closed executive session. Personally I would be perfectly willing to have the people know all about the discussion and the votes. As a matter of fact, I think if the votes are to be made public, that it is far better also to have the discussion made public, because the mere publication of a vote may work a greater injustice to Senators than if the debate were made public.

I have framed my proposed amendment in the way it is because I have felt that the Senate probably would not be willing to go the whole length of making the proceedings on every nomination public. Personally, as I have said, I would be willing to have that done; I would be glad to have the rules amended in that way, and if such an amendment shall be proposed I shall vote for it so far as that is concerned; but I have proposed this amendment to the rules, as I have said, in the belief that it is as far as we can possibly hope to go, and there is very serious doubt whether or not we will be able to go even that far. I take it that it will take a two-thirds vote to adopt this resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no, Mr. President; I beg to differ with the Senator as to that; it will not require a two-thirds vote to amend the rules.

Mr. JONES. It has been so ruled heretofore.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that there has been no ruling of that sort.

Mr. JONES. Very well; I am glad to have that statement from the Vice President, because this is a proposed amendment to the rules——

The VICE PRESIDENT. A majority vote only is required to amend the rules. A two-thirds vote is required to suspend the rules.

Mr. JONES. The matter of suspension is in the same paragraph as the matter of amendment, and I supposed the same ruling would apply; but I am glad to have the ruling of the Vice President. I think he is right. I have felt in the past that the ruling that required a two-thirds vote even to suspend the rules was not in accordance with the rules.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I want to express my especial gratification at the parliamentary situation as indicated by the present occupant of the chair. I have been contending for that ruling for a long, long time, and I never before got any kind of encouragement for it.

Mr. JONES. I am glad to have that ruling myself.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. In view of what the Senator has said about his desire to protect the right of a Senator who is falsely accused, as some Senators have been, of the way they voted in executive session on a nomination, why does not the Senator himself put into his amendment a provision that any Senator may tell his constituents in answer to a question how he voted, and explain his reasons if he chooses to do so? In other words, Mr. President, may we not have read the amendment that is to be offered by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES. I should have no objection to that. As I said a while ago, I should have no objection to making public every vote on every nomination.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will permit me, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, I will send my amendment to the desk to be read for the information of the Senate, if the Senator desires me to do so.

Mr. JONES. I shall be glad to have the Senator have his proposal read.

Mr. NORRIS. I send to the desk an amendment that I propose to offer as soon as I can get the floor, to be added at the end of the proposed rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add, at the end of the rule proposed by the Senator from Washington, the following:

All roll calls in closed executive session, together with a statement of the question upon which such roll calls are had, shall be published in the RECORD.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, that is a very different proposal from the one the Senator from Washington has just stated he was willing to accept.

Mr. JONES. Yes; I am willing to vote for a rule that will provide for having all nominations considered in open executive session, so far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand that the proposal is limited to open executive sessions with respect to nominations. It has nothing to do with executive sessions for the purpose of considering treaties?

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think myself that we might very well comply with this suggestion as to all nominations. I do think there is some real need at this time for considering treaties in executive session.

Mr. JONES. I agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is not disturbed by this amendment?

Mr. JONES. No. I was going to say just a word about the terms of this proposal.

This proposal practically reverses the rule as it has been construed and as it has been applied. At present we are required to go into executive session on all nominations. Under the rule as proposed, hereafter nominations shall be considered in open executive session.

In order to consider a nomination in open executive session now it must be so decreed by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, and that is really what led me to put the two-thirds provision in this proposal, which is as follows:

Hereafter nominations shall be considered in open executive session unless the Senate, in closed executive session, shall, by a two-thirds vote, determine that any particular nomination shall be considered in closed executive session—

In other words, I have simply reversed the rule as it applies to the Senate to-day. That is the reason why I put in the two-thirds provision. Now, before we can have a nomination considered in open executive session, we must have a two-thirds vote. As this rule proposes that all nominations shall be considered in open executive session, I would have them considered in open executive session unless otherwise ordered upon a two-thirds vote, according to this rule.

And in that case paragraph 2 of this rule—

That is, the other paragraph relating to these nominations—shall apply to such nomination and its consideration.

Mr. President, I think this is all I care to say in regard to the matter.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator has just made reference to paragraph 2 of the rule. What becomes of that paragraph?

Mr. JONES. Paragraph 2 is suspended so long as the Senate considers these nominations in open session; but if the Senate, by a two-thirds vote, shall decide to consider a nomination in closed session, then the provisions of paragraph 2 apply.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I had in mind the same matter which apparently was in the mind of the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE]. I think there would be some incongruity in adopting the rule just as suggested by the Senator from Washington. You have paragraph 2:

All information communicated or remarks made—

And so forth, and so forth—the same rule. Then:

Hereafter nominations shall be considered in open executive session unless the Senate—

These would seem to be altogether incongruous. I suggest to the Senator that the more appropriate way to do it would be to provide:

That paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to proceedings on nominations in executive session, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

Then follow with your proposal:

Hereafter nominations shall be considered in open executive session unless the Senate, in closed executive session, shall by a two-thirds vote determine that any particular nomination shall be considered in closed executive session, and in that case paragraph 2 of this rule shall apply to such nomination and its consideration.

Instead of "and in that case," have it read:

When nominations are so considered in executive session, all information communicated—

And so forth, just as in paragraph 2. In other words, amend paragraph 2 so that it will be introduced by the Senator's language, and then have the provision in regard to going into closed executive session.

Mr. JONES. I can not see, myself, where that makes any difference at all. Of course the language of my provision merely suspends paragraph 2 so long as nominations are considered in open session; but if the Senate, by the necessary vote, decides to consider them in closed session, then paragraph 2 does apply. I should have no objection to framing the amendment along the lines suggested by the Senator from Montana, because I think his suggestion means exactly the same thing as mine.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course I intended that it should.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It simply seemed to me to be incongruous to say that all information shall be held secret and then say that nominations shall be considered in closed session.

Mr. JONES. But this becomes a paragraph in the same rule.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. You have paragraph 2 and then paragraph 7 relating to the same thing.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but paragraph 7, of course, is adopted after paragraph 2, and of course is intended to do away with paragraph 2, but only so long as these nominations are considered in open session. I did that more particularly because I desired to have the paragraph a short one; and, as I said, I think the meaning, the application, is exactly the same as in the case of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. Following the suggestion of the Senator from Montana, which I think is a most wise one, let me make this suggestion to the Senator from Washington:

Paragraph 2 as it stands reads as follows:

All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret. If, however, charges shall be made against a person nominated, the committee may, in its discretion, notify such nominee thereof—

And so forth. Now the Senator is going to add certain language to that. Section 7 of the proposed rule reads as follows:

Hereafter nominations shall be considered in open executive session unless the Senate, in closed executive session, shall by a two-thirds vote determine that any particular nomination shall be considered in closed executive session, and in that case paragraph 2 of this rule shall apply to such nomination and its consideration.

The point that I want to bring before the Senator and the rest of my colleagues is this: If we go into executive session—and we shall, under the Senator's rule—for the purpose of determining whether or not we shall go into open session, in the executive session comments may be made upon the appointee of the President not very laudatory of that appointee. If we go back again into open executive session, the wording of the Senator's proposed paragraph 7 would authorize every Member of the Senate who was present to comment upon and repeat what was said in closed executive session. I can not escape that conclusion.

Mr. JONES. Why, yes; that is true.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think the Senator means to do that.

Mr. JONES. I can see no harm that would result from that.

Mr. BAYARD. Oh, yes; there might be harm.

Mr. JONES. Not at all.

Mr. BAYARD. For this reason, Mr. President: Mr. A may be nominated for thus and such an office. The matter may be taken up in executive session to determine whether or no we should go into open session; and during that executive session many things may be said derogatory to the character of Mr. A. Then the Senate determines to go back into open session——

Mr. JONES. But it takes a two-thirds vote to do that.

Mr. BAYARD. And the person who made these derogatory remarks may not feel justified or warranted in saying in open session what he said in closed session. Nevertheless his colleagues have the right, under the proposed rule as suggested by the Senator from Washington, to talk about those things derogatory to the nominee here, there, and everywhere.

Mr. JONES. Why, certainly, Mr. President. If the Senate now should by a two-thirds vote, after discussion, decide to hold an open executive session on a nomination, there is nothing to prevent a Senator from repeating or referring to everything that was said in the executive session. So I can see no harm coming from a discussion in executive session if it is decided by a two-thirds vote to consider such nomination in open session.

Mr. BAYARD. Then, Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator should strike out all of paragraph 2, and follow the method suggested by the Senator from Montana, and substitute his proposed paragraph 7 for paragraph 2, because as long as we have the two upon our rule book, if they get there, we are going to have a definition of secrecy under paragraph 2, and a definition of our powers of divulging that secrecy merely because we happen to change from closed to open session. We can not escape it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not understand that the proposal of the Senator from Montana is to do away with paragraph 2 at all.

Mr. BAYARD. It is to substitute and amend paragraph 2; but the Senator from Washington proposes to leave it there on the rule book.

Mr. JONES. The effect, as I take it, is exactly the same. If a nomination is considered in closed executive session under the rule as amended, then nothing can be given out; but if it is not considered in closed executive session, if it is considered in open executive session, even though this may be put back under paragraph 2, it can all be given out just the same.

Mr. BAYARD. Oh, no! May I say this to the Senator——

Mr. JONES. I may be very dull intellectually, but I can not see any substantial difference between what I have put in and what the Senator from Montana suggests.

Mr. BAYARD. Let me state this case to the Senator then:

Mr. A is nominated. The question arises, assuming that the Senator's rule is adopted, whether we shall consider his nomination in open or closed session. We go into closed session for the purpose of determining that question; and during the closed session remarks may be made about Mr. A, the nominee, which are distinctly derogatory to Mr. A. They are made in closed executive session by reason of the fact that the Senator who makes them does not care to make them in the open session. After the question is decided we go back again into open executive session, and then we release the seal of secrecy upon all the Senators who have heard that, and they can quote Senator A, Senator B, or Senator C in regard to this nominee, and he is powerless. It may be he was making his remarks on information and belief, without any definite foundation for them.

Mr. JONES. That would be exactly the same if the rule were amended in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator want to do that?

Mr. JONES. I say that if a vote is taken after discussion, the man who makes the charges knows that unless two-thirds of the Senate vote to consider the matter in executive session, it will be public. I see nothing wrong about that. I see no harm to come from that. As I said a while ago, I would be perfectly willing to have a rule that would provide for the consideration of nominations, without any qualification, in open executive session, as far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I say to the Senator, that if section 2 of the rule have section 7 added to it, as he proposes it now, he will open the very breach which he is now trying to close.

Mr. JONES. I think the Senator is mistaken in that.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the Senator yield to me to enter a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules, so that the motion may be pending? I want to leave the Chamber.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to that, so that the motion may be pending.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the motion be entered, to refer the matter to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. JONES. That will not cut off debate?

Mr. CURTIS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to have the opportunity for amendment cut off.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not intend that it shall be.

Mr. NORRIS. If an amendment is offered, and there is a motion pending to refer——

Mr. CURTIS. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator would better withdraw it. The Senator, I think, will have an opportunity to make the motion later.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think every Senator understands this proposition, and, so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to allow the matter to come to a vote.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask the Senator from Washington a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. I observe it is provided in the resolution that in order that a particular nomination shall be considered in secrecy, the Senate must go into executive session to decide that question. Why should not the question be decided in open session, as well as action on the nomination itself?

Mr. JONES. Because if we are going to have a rule like this, then the reasons for holding open executive session could very consistently, it seems to me, be presented in closed executive session, so that if the Senate should decide that a particular case then before it should be considered in closed executive session none of the matters against the nominee would be entitled to publicity.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is there anything sacred about a nominee whose name has been sent in by the President that should entitle him to have his qualifications shrouded in secrecy any more than a man who asks the people to elect him to some office?

Mr. JONES. The Senator knows that I have said that personally I would be in favor of considering all nominations in open executive session.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is my position precisely.

Mr. JONES. But the Senator knows what apparently is the sentiment of the Senate, or, at least, what it has been indicated to be by votes in the past. If I am sure I can not get all that personally I would be in favor of, I am willing to go as far as I can toward my object, and I have presented this matter in this way because I felt that this probably would be as far as we could possibly go, and I have my doubt about the Senate even going this far. But I have felt that this is as far as we could possibly hope to have the Senate go and that this is much better than the existing rule. Probably after we have proceeded a while under a rule like this we can get the Senate to go the whole length and consider all nominations in open session.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire at this time to offer an amendment. I move to add at the end of the proposed rule the following:

> All roll calls in closed executive session, together with a statement of the question upon which such roll calls are had, shall be published in the RECORD.

If that amendment is agreed to, to a great extent it will obviate the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Kentucky.

Before I get to the proposed amendment, however, I want to discuss briefly the general proposition involved in the proposed change. I think we ought to consider all public business in the open. If I had my way about it, I would go a good deal further than is proposed by this resolution. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky. However, other Senators do not agree with us, and we have to respect their judgment and their opinion. A majority of the Senators are perhaps in disagreement with those of us who believe as we do. So we must take things as they are, and not as we would like to have them, and get out of it what we can, if anything, that will help to solve this difficulty that arises continually, and has been very much discussed recently throughout the entire country in connection with the nomination of Mr. West, which was recently considered in closed session.

First, I want to call the attention of the Senate to an injustice under our present system which applies to Senators who, in absolute good faith, want to obey the rule. It is true that Senators do not agree on the construction of the rule to which I am going to call attention, but those of us who believe one way are under a handicap which does not apply to Senators who have a different idea as to the construction of the rule.

There is a very sharp line of demarcation as to the construction of a certain sentence in paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVIII. All Senators realize that. I am going to read a part of this paragraph, enough to call attention to the particular language I want to consider. Commencing with paragraph 2, the rule reads as follows:

> All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret.

The particular part of that rule to which I want to call the attention of the Senate is the last clause, "also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret."

As I construe that rule, and as it is construed by the Senator from Washington and a great many other Senators, it would prevent a Senator from telling how he himself voted on any particular nomination. It is true other Senators claim that there is nothing in the language which would prevent a Senator from telling how he voted, and those who believe that way can conscientiously tell the public how they did vote on any nomination. But a man who wants to obey the rules, who wants to be obedient to the law of the Senate, and does not believe that that construction is right, is handicapped. If he puts upon that language the construction which it seems to me must be placed upon it, he can not make public how he voted. If we put that construction on it, that one can tell how he voted, it would simply in effect vitiate the entire paragraph, because it would not be a difficult thing to ask every Senator how he voted, and thus find out just exactly what the vote was.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to an experience of my own. In a campaign in my State a few years ago a charge was openly made against me in a newspaper, and I think it was quoted in other newspapers, and the paper attempted to give my vote in executive session on a certain very important nomination; but they said I voted against a certain confirmation, when, as a matter of fact, I had voted for it.

Under those circumstances, being wrongfully accused in the public press on a very important vote had in the Senate of the United States, what was my remedy? I felt that under the rule I had no right to tell how I voted and I suffered in silence, and never made any reference to the charge that was being made. Yet that charge was one that any citizen had a right to make. Action on that nomination was a part of my official work as the representative of my people. It seems to me they had a right to know how I stood on that question, the same as they would have a right to know how I stood on a tariff question, or a taxation question, or any other question that could possibly come before the Senate in its legislative capacity.

Other Senators would have taken a different course and would have denied the charge, and perhaps they would have been right. But I never felt that that was the proper construction of the rule, and in applying it to myself, it seemed to me that I had either to suffer personal injury or I had to violate a rule of the Senate.

Mr. President, nobody wants to violate the rules of the Senate. When a Senator takes an obligation to obey the rules of the Senate, he wants to obey them; and nothing short of a revolutionary spirit could induce a Senator to violate them. The right of revolution I concede is a sacred right, which exists in the Senate the same as everywhere else; and I have long contemplated whether those of us who feel as I do on this subject would not be justified in a parliamentary revolution, as some Senators have before stated that they would under no circumstances be bound to secrecy in a matter which affected their own official acts, when their action was questioned by those whom they represented.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEPHENS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senate has the constitutional right to impose secrecy in the cases where the rule does impose a ban of secrecy, would it not also have the constitutional right to pass on legislation in secret?

Mr. NORRIS. I am inclined to think so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I supposed it was very well understood that for a long time the proceedings of the Senate were conducted in secrecy.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct. The question I wanted to ask the Senator from Nebraska was, whether it is prohibited by any constitutional provision or not, if it is not contrary to the spirit of American democracy, and to the spirit of the formation and evolution of our legal and legislative system, to have our legislative proceedings behind closed doors?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I agree with the Senator, and I have often said that it is contrary to the fundamental principle underlying every democracy. I can conceive, however, that there may come times when secrecy would be necessary, particularly, perhaps, when we were at war, when the giving of publicity to some important matter might enable the enemy of our country to secure an advantage. Under those circumstances, perhaps, the very preservation of our own Government might call upon us to transact some business in secret.

I could call the Senator's attention to a bill that we passed during the late war. While we had to act in public, the committee of which I happened to be a member met in executive session on Sunday. There was one reason why we did so. It was said by those governmental officials who proposed the action to us that if what we had in view became publicly known it would be very injurious to one of our allies in the World War. I remember that the work of that committee was kept secret, and we had to do it to prevent some objections being made on the floor of the Senate by Senators who would have done it with perfect innocence, because they did not know what the difficulty was. We had to tell them privately and quite a number of Senators were quieted, and the matter received practically no attention when we passed the bill in public session.

Such situations might arise. It is very seldom that they do arise. I can not recall now a single nomination since I have been a Member of the Senate that, as I look back over it, ought to have been considered in secret executive session. There may have been some, but I do not recall any; I do not think of any now. In the case of Mr. West the evidence was taken in public. It was printed as a public document subject to circulation through the mails under the frank of a Senator or Member of the House. It was as public as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The evidence was all taken in public, but when we came to pass upon the evidence taken in public we went into secret executive session and acted in secret session, and none of the votes in that session were made public.

Senators may say that in that case there was not much importance attached to it, and for argument's sake I might admit it, although I think that it was of great importance. Senators disagreed on the point as to how much public importance was attached to that action of the Senate. I thought, and some other Senators thought, and people outside of the Senate agreed with us, that we were taking an action as important as any public action that we had taken during this session of Congress. Whether we are agreed with or not, there are thousands of honest, patriotic citizens who believe that, and yet the action was taken behind closed doors. I think it could be very well compared with any of the votes we have taken on any bill. Senators know there would be an outcry in the country if we undertook to pass any general legislation behind closed doors.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator. The Senator referred to the fact that committee meetings on nominations were held in public and the proceedings were published. I am a member of two committees that have to pass, one of them very frequently and the other at less frequent intervals, on nominations. It has never been the practice of either of those committees, with one exception, to hold in public its hearings in regard to nominations. It has occurred to me several times to wonder why it was that committees which were considering nominations which must be considered by the Senate in secret executive session, unless the rule were altered, should hold their hearings on those nominations in public and publish the record as spread before them on the qualifications or disqualifications of candidates. Can the Senator enlighten us on that point?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that if we follow out the theory of secret sessions, then I think he is entirely right. If we are going to vote in secret we ought to take the evidence in secret. But as a matter of practice, while we do both ways, as a rule the evidence is taken in public.

Now let us take the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just at that point?

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; I yield.

Mr. JONES. I have thought about that question many times. The sessions or meetings of the committee which we have held were executive sessions to hear testimony or otherwise. I believe that under the rule we are violating the rule whenever a committee takes testimony and makes it public under such circumstances.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield just for a moment——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If I understood the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] correctly, he said that the spirit of democracy was to have all public business conducted in public.

Mr. BLACK. It is contrary to the spirit of democracy to do otherwise.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I suppose the Senator will agree with me that Washington and Franklin believed in the true spirit of democracy?

Mr. BLACK. I will agree with the Senator to that extent, and further state that I agree with Mr. Jefferson in his criticism as to holding the Constitutional Convention in secret.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I was about to observe that if the theory of the distinguished Senator from Alabama and the immortal Jefferson had been followed, we never would have had a Constitution of the United States, and, permit me to add, my opinion is supported by a great many and deeper thinkers than I am. If the debates, sometimes acrimonious, of that historic convention had been carried on in the open, we never would have had a Constitution. If the theory of Jefferson and the scholarly Senator from Alabama had been adopted, the attempt to "form a more perfect Union" would have ended in failure.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not wish to yield for a discussion between two other Senators. I realize I will never get anywhere with my comments if I practically yield the floor for other Senators to engage in a debate. I will answer any question submitted to me if I can.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I wish merely to dissent from the view of the junior Senator from Alabama and to hold as I have indicated.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, may I make just one brief statement in that connection?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I want to add to what the Senator has said that one of the chief arguments used against the adoption of the Constitution, and used very successfully in many States and that affected many minds, was the fact that the sessions were held behind closed doors.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it would not change my mind if some one quoted George Washington to the effect that he had said he was in favor of doing public business behind closed doors. Probably if I had lived in the days of Washington, I might have agreed with him. But I have such great respect for our forefathers that it seems to me the way we can honor them most is to try to progress and go a little bit further than they went, and to carry the torch of civilization a little bit further into the wilderness than our forefathers carried it. I hope when I am gone that those who follow me will not stop where I do but will carry on. I am firmly of the opinion that if, at the beginning of this Goverment, the Senate and the House had commenced to transact public business behind closed doors, we would not be here to-day, at least representing the same Government that we are now trying our best to represent. I do not believe that a democracy can permanently stand when its public business is transacted in secret.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I merely wish to suggest to the Senator from California that he might quote another President of the United States who said he believed in open covenants openly arrived at.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But they never were arrived at. The trouble was they never reached the point of arrival.

Mr. NORRIS. The fact that they were not arrived at does not, in my judgment, do away with the justice of the proposition that we should have open covenants and arrive at them openly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if I may add a word——

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. We never do attain the ideal that we have in our minds, and we will probably satisfy our own consciences if we come as near to it as we can. I yield now to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Open covenants openly arrived at may not have been arrived at in the days of Mr. Wilson, but they have been more recently arrived at, and openly.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the time will come when all covenants will be open, and all arrived at openly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is the Senator in favor of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to vote for it. I would rather have it entirely open than the way he has it, but I think the resolution proposed by the Senator from Washington is a very great improvement over the present procedure of the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is eminently fair-minded and always desires to do what is right and what is fair to any individual, as everyone knows. Does it occur to the Senator that the proposed rule, if put into operation, may place a stigma on an innocent man when thousands and thousands of people are confirmed in the open and suddenly some day one man is singled out to have his nomination considered in secret? At the present time thousands of postmasters throughout the country have their nominations considered in secret, and the nominations of thousands of officers of the Army and Navy are considered in secret. The rule is that everyone who is innocent shall have his nomination considered in secret, and only when the public business demands it does it come into the public before the Senate, when two-thirds of the Senators think it should be discussed in public. Does not the Senator feel that to single out one man and discuss his nomination in private is going to make it extremely difficult for that man?

Mr. NORRIS. I will tell the Senator how to avoid that. If he will come over, with his powerful influence in the Senate, to the weak group of men that I belong to and who thus far have been in the minority, and wield the wonderful power of his influence with us, we will not have such instances. We will consider all such cases in public, and hence there will be no stigma upon some man who may be singled out. We will not single out anybody if we can get the help of the Senator to carry on. There will be no stigma.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator said he is going to vote for the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I would rather vote for the resolution if it proposed to consider all of them in public, but because we have so many Senators with their great power and their eloquence and their ingenuity like the Senator from Connecticut, we have to take one bite at a time. I would rather have half a loaf than no bread at all.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that any man nominated could avoid that difficulty by expressing the desire to have his nomination considered in open executive session.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and his friends here in the Senate could avoid it by doing the same thing. But is a man nominated for office by the President entitled to any greater privilege than the man who is running for an elective office? Are we going to fill our appointive offices with men who would not get to first base if they had to go before the public?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield. Are we going to say that men who could not go out before their constituents and in the eyes of the public and have the light of publicity turned upon their qualifications and their character in a contest before the people, shall be shielded from the same dangers, if we want to call them dangers, that every one of us and every other man running for an elective office from President down to road overseer must meet before the people?

I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator mean to suggest that those who are running for an elective office had better be elected in the future by open ballot rather than by secret ballot as we have done in recent years?

Mr. NORRIS. Now, the Senator is going into another question. A secret ballot must be had. The Australian ballot, the secret ballot, is one that has been demanded by the advancing tide of civilization not for the protection of the candidate, as the Senator would indicate by his question, but to prevent men of power and influence and wealth from buying, with money and other promises, the citizenship of the United States. That is why we have the secret ballot.

The candidate has no protection on account of the secret ballot——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment—but he must go out before the people and fight his battle in the open. If, however, he is appointed to an office, perhaps ten times more important, then his nomination is considered behind closed doors. A man may run—I have in mind several such instances—for United States Senator where he has to fight in the open; he may be repudiated by his people, condemned at the ballot box, defeated in the open contest before the people, and then be appointed to some office much better than the one he lost and that the people denied him, and his nomination be brought before the Senate, and be considered behind closed doors in executive session.

Why should not the people have the right to know what is said, what is done, what are his qualifications, and what are the votes when we vote on the confirmation, let us say, of an Attorney General or a Secretary of State, or a judge, just as the people would have the right to know if those officers were running before the people and had to go before them in open contest?

Now I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that in the old days, before we had the Australian ballot system, we had the plain open ticket; the powers that be would marshal the voters in blocks of a hundred, make them hold up their tickets, and they would have a captain go with them to the polls and see that they deposited their ballots. It was for the good of government, both local and national, that that system was abolished and that the voter himself might retire to a polling booth, vote according to his judgment, fold his ballot, and put it in the box without anyone knowing how he voted; but we come from those people; we have been selected by them, and in this representative form of government we must give an account to them of our stewardship. If we hold a secret session in this body and discuss nominations and finally determine what we shall do, we owe it to those people and to the country to give the registered judgment of this body, and that is what we ought to do.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GLENN. Does the Senator from Nebraska believe that the Supreme Court of the United States and similar courts throughout the Nation in considering their decisions should admit the public and that their discussions and deliberations should be carried on in the presence of the public?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I would not say that; nor would I say that a committee of the Senate when it undertakes to consider and thresh out amendments to a bill should hold its sessions openly, mainly because the ordinary procedure is necessary in order to arrive at proper conclusions and to give the proper consideration to a measure; but votes in the Senate ought to be published. I would not for a moment stand for the proposition that when the Supreme Court of the United States rendered an opinion they should not tell how many judges concurred and how many disagreed; that fact ought to be made public. When we have before us the nomination of a judge for the Supreme Court of the United States I think that ought to be considered openly; and I mean no disrespect to the judge; I am not thinking of him; I am thinking of the country at large.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts and Mr. BRUCE addressed the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator from Nebraska is of course aware of the fact that it was very seriously urged at one time that every justice of the Supreme Court of the United States should be obliged publicly to give his opinion upon every decision rendered by that court, and that suggestion came very near being adopted.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I now yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska not to forget the fact that, of course, the deliberations of the Supreme Court judges are finally embodied in their conclusions which contain their reasoning and the authorities on which they act, as evidenced by published reports of their decisions.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. President, coming now to the amendment which I have offered to the resolution, let me say that it simply provides that all roll calls in executive session shall be published. Suppose a motion shall be made in executive session to consider a nomination in open executive session. That involves a controversy, and naturally there are two sides to it. There may be some reasons one way and some reasons another, but have not the people a right to know whether their Senators are for open executive sessions or for closed executive sessions on a particular matter? Then, suppose a vote is had and those who favor an open executive session are defeated, and that a motion is then made in executive session that the roll call by which the motion was defeated shall be published; is there any possible objection to that? And yet under our rules that can not be done, unless, as it has been decided, there is a two-thirds vote in executive session to publish it. Is there any reason why the people of my State should not know whether I voted for a closed session or an open session on any nomination? Can any man give any reason why such information should not be public? It has nothing to do with the character or qualifications of the man who is a candidate for office, but only has to do with letting the people know whether I stood for an open session or a closed session. That does not affect the argument for closed sessions; it does not affect the argument for open sessions; but merely whether the people shall know how their representatives voted on that question. If the people of a State want their Senators to vote for closed sessions and they agree with them and accept their commissions on that condition, then, of course, they would be for closed sessions, but should they be able to conceal that fact from their constituents or should they be able to say to them, "I will not tell you whether I am for an open session or a closed session"?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BINGHAM. I sympathize entirely with the position taken by the Senator, but why does he not offer an amendment to make it perfectly clear in the rules what some Senators already believe to be their right as a question of self-defense, that any Senator is permitted, whenever he feels so inclined, to state how he has voted and give the reasons therefor? Why does not the Senator suggest that kind of an amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator knows that I have; the Senator knows now, if he will remember what happened in executive session, I have done exactly the thing that he proposes, and I take it that I had the powerful opposition of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. No; Mr. President, I think the Senator did not understand me correctly. What I asked the Senator was why he did not propose an amendment to the rules which would permit an individual Senator to state what he did but not to tell what his neighbors did?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have proposed, and there is now pending, an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Washington that will go just a little further than that; that will publish the roll call in the RECORD, and let the country know not only how I voted but how every other Senator voted.

Now, let me say to the Senator—I tried to make that plain a while ago but evidently I have not done so—that the construction he places upon the rule differs from mine. I am not criticizing his judgment at all, except that I can not agree that a Senator now has the right to tell how he voted. I do not think he has, and, not believing I have that right, I do not believe I have a moral right to exercise it. The Senator thinks he has a right to tell how he voted. Let me show him just what the result of that would be. It would only be a roundabout way of accomplishing what my amendment seeks to accomplish directly. In other words, if every Senator could tell how he voted, then it would only be necessary for the newspaper man who wants to ascertain the facts to ask or have somebody else ask every Senator how he voted, and he would then have the roll call and would accomplish indirectly the publication of what the rule provides shall be a secret. So that, under the Senator's construction, the rule as it stands does not mean anything. The only thing I complain about it is that it means one thing to some Senators and a different thing to others. This amendment will change it. This amendment will put a record vote in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD every time it occurs, and hence everybody will know how every Senator voted.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the Senator's amendment does not give to a Senator the right to explain his vote, does it?

Mr. NORRIS. No; there is nothing said about an explanation of a vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. It merely publishes the way he voted without his permission.

Mr. NORRIS. I should be glad to accept an amendment that, in addition to the roll call, there shall be put in the RECORD any explanation that any Senator may desire to make in regard to his vote. I should be glad to have that done. The Senator knows that we can not adopt that. I think the Senator is aware of the fact that that kind of an amendment would fail. I have no objection to it; I would be glad to let every Senator have a page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD every time we hold an executive session where a roll call is had to enable him to explain his vote, if the Senate desires to do that; but I anticipate that would not get the votes of one-fourth of the Senate membership. The question involved as to the roll calls is clear. Suppose we take a roll call as to whether we are going to consider a question in open or in secret session when a motion is made that we consider the question in open session. My amendment would bring about a statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of what the question was and of the motion made. The RECORD the next day would say "the Senate considered this nomination in open executive session; and upon motion, a roll call was had, with the following result." There you have it.

If some Senator should want to explain his vote, I would have no objection, though I do not think any Senator would want to do so. It would be known whether he was in favor of the particular question or whether he was against it—the roll call would show that—and that would be the final judgment; that would be the decree of a court supreme within its domain; and why the people should not know how the different members of the court voted is more than I can comprehend.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat will he yield to another question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. With regard to the confirmation of a nominee for high office of an executive nature, is it not true that there might be a Senator so different, let me say, from the courageous Senator from Nebraska that he would not like to vote against that confirmation for fear that if the appointee were confirmed the day might come when some constituent of the Senator might desire him to secure a favor from that high official, and the high official might put his request to one side very quietly and without giving any reason, but in his heart knowing the reason was that the particular Senator had opposed him on the floor and had made it very disagreeable and difficult for his nomination to be confirmed? Is it not true that that is one of the reasons why our forefathers provided for secret sessions of the Senate—in order to protect a Senator who in his conscience desired to vote against the confirmation of a nominee, but feared that if he did so he and his constituents would be likely to suffer for it in the future?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator has asked me a very proper question. I am glad he asked it, because it suggests a phase of this matter which I have not discussed, but which I should like to discuss.

In the first place, I do not know whether or not that was one of the reasons why these secret sessions were provided for. I never heard anybody suggest that it was; but, whether it was or not, I want to say that the condition the Senator has outlined might occur. Most of the Senators here are lawyers. The confirmation of a judge might come up. He might be a supreme judge, a circuit or a district judge. He might be a district judge in a Senator's own State; or some Senator as an attorney—and we have many of them here with national reputations—might have cases coming up in the Supreme Court, and it might be that a supreme judge might take some revenge on him in court. That is true. A circuit judge or a district judge might do it. A Cabinet officer might do it. That is all true. I frankly admit that that might happen.

Mr. BINGHAM. And is it not also true, even more than that, that the President might punish a Senator for voting against the President's wishes if the President knew that he had done so?

Mr. NORRIS. I will take that up in a moment. That is another suggestion that I want to discuss; but let me finish the other one first. That is a responsibility, Mr. President, that every Senator must assume.

There is not a State in this Union where, on important matters of legislation, the people are not divided—honestly, conscientiously divided. Take prohibition: We have a vote here on prohibition, and let us say that I vote against a prohibition law, and it is done in a secret session. We are going to have a secret session to protect me against the anger of my constituents, and so I vote secretly against prohibition; and if I voted openly the people in favor of prohibition might take revenge upon me if I were a candidate for reelection to the Senate. That is all true. There is not any question of any importance arising or that ever will arise before the Senate of which that is not true. We must assume those responsibilities, and the man who is not willing to assume them ought not to be here.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the same thing might be said with respect to the election of judges all over the United States. My recollection is that in 40 of the 48 States the judges are elected. The members of the bar have to take the responsibility as citizens of voting either for one candidate for judge or for another candidate for judge; and I have never discovered that any of them was very fearful about expressing his choice as between rival candidates.

Mr. NORRIS. And yet it is true that the judge, if he wanted to be that kind of a man, could take all kinds of advantage of a lawyer. Everybody knows that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why, of course. Nothing of the kind is to be assumed, however.

Mr. NORRIS. A man does not have to be a judge to do that. The point I want to make is that we ought not to try to shift responsibility. We ought not to try to hide our action for fear somebody will take revenge on us. That comes up in every Senator's campaign. He has done something here that somebody does not like, and the man goes after him for it. Would you have that vote in secret so that the other fellow could not find out what the Senator did?

Another thing—and again I thank the Senator from Connecticut for calling it to my attention—he said the President could take advantage of you if you did not vote as he desired. Again that is true; and he can do it now. Under our rules as they stand now he can do it. That is another thing that is unfair. While we conceal from the public our action here in executive sessions, we certify under the hand of our executive clerk to the President of the United States just what we do.

Let me read you a rule. It is Rule XXXIX:

> The President of the United States shall, from time to time, be furnished with an authenticated transcript of the executive records of the Senate, but no further extract from the Executive Journal shall be furnished by the Secretary except by special order of the Senate; and no paper, except original treaties transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States, and finally acted upon by the Senate, shall be delivered from the office of the Secretary without an order of the Senate for that purpose.

Why, Mr. President, does anybody think for a moment that the President of the United States does not know within 24 hours—yea, within 24 minutes, if he wants to find it out—just exactly how every Member of this body voted on any nomination that the President has sent here? And if the President is the kind of a man that wants to take revenge upon a Senator because he has not voted as the President wanted him to vote on a nomination, he can take that revenge now. If we have a President who is so narrow-minded, so unpatriotic, so far forgetful of his duty as that, I know of no way to remedy it by passing all the rules for secrecy that the ingenuity of man can invent; and how will he take revenge? By refusing to give the Senator his proper piece of political pie.

There are Senators who have lived for quite a while in this body who have not seen the political pie counter for years, who have never been admitted into the inclosure where the plum tree blossoms, and they get along pretty well. They are not kicking about anything that is happening. So if a President wants to do that, let him do it. You can not prevent it, either, if you adopt this rule or if you defeat it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. I call the Senator's attention to Rule XXXVI, which says:

> When the President of the United States shall meet the Senate in the Senate Chamber for the consideration of executive business he shall have a seat on the right of the Presiding Officer.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. I thank the Senator for that interruption. The President of the United States is entitled to walk into the Senate Chamber right now, if we are in secret session; and if he does, the Presiding Officer will have to move his chair over a little and put another one up there, so as to enable the President to sit where he can listen and see and hear everything that we do.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Would the Senator be in favor of having the discussion in public and the voting in secret, as is done in political campaigns?

May I say to the Senator, before he answers, that in my own State—where we are very proud of the record of our judiciary and believe it is second to none in the United States—we have protected our senators who ratify gubernatorial appointments by seeing to it that all votes on nominations which come from the governor shall be secret ballots, so that each senator may vote exactly according to his conscience, without the slightest fear of displeasing the governor in any particular, or of trying to secure his favorable notice by voting for one of his nominees.

Mr. NORRIS. The State of Connecticut, of course, has a perfect right to have that kind of a law and that kind of a rule. I am not finding fault with it. I should oppose it if I lived there, if I were a part of their government; but that makes no difference. They have a perfect right to it, and it is surprising that under that kind of a rule they have done so well—because they have done well. I pay my respects to the legislature and the judiciary of the State of Connecticut. I am not finding fault with them. In spite of that secret rule they are pretty good fellows, not because of it.

Why, if the Senator's argument is good and logical, it seems to me he ought to be standing up here in the Senate advocating the closing of these doors and the driving out of everybody from the galleries, and the exclusion of the representatives of the press, and the insistence that if secrecy is so good in a representative democracy we ought to have more of it, and do nothing else except what we do in secret.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the Senator is not quite fair there.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to be unfair.

Mr. BINGHAM. I know the Senator does not.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator can correct me if he desires.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I call to the Senator's attention the fact that in most organizations in this country, whether they be of a fraternal nature or of a social nature or even of a religious nature, the committee which has to deal with the personal qualifications of candidates, whether they be to join a church or to join a lodge or to join a club, always holds its meetings in secret, for the reason that, as we all know, human beings are very sensitive and do not like to have their idiosyncrasies discussed in public, and that when personalities are discussed a better result is secured if we do it behind closed doors, whereas when we are discussing great measures a better result is secured by discussing them in public.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the secret societies, even the churches and all lodges, consider those things in secret. I am not complaining about it. They have a perfect right to do it. If you are going to have a secret society, you must consider something in secret. I am a member, however, of several secret societies. I have had the honor to be the head in my State of one of the national secret societies, and its representative for four years in a sovereign grand lodge; and I have said behind the closed doors many a time that the beautiful lessons that are taught there I should like to see staged before the whole world. The teaching of fraternity, the teaching of brotherly love, even of patriotic spirit in those societies, results, I think, in a great deal of good; but they have a picked membership. In one respect they are churches. They have a certain line of duty that they are trying to perform for the upbuilding of civilization. They mark out a certain course that they are going to take, and they say, "We will not take everybody. We will not take the man in the gutter. Some other organization will." Maybe they are wrong in not doing it, but that is their business. They say, "The man must have a good moral character when we start with him. He must be so far along in civilization before we are going to take him up and try to make him even better." That is the fundamental principle underlying their organization, and they go on with their work in their way.

We, however, are not a secret organization. We are the representatives here of 120,000,000 people who compose this Government; and I think nobody will dispute the fact that our business—our legislative business, our official business—must be transacted in the eyes of the world.

When it comes to a nominee, often of no importance—most of them, if I had my way about it, I would not have here at all; I would not give the Senate the right to act on 90 per cent of them—some of them are extremely important. Some of them have to do with a national policy. Some of them have to do with human justice. Some of them have to do with foreign relations that may bring us into war, or may conduct us in a peaceful way through the trials and tribulations of foreign diplomacy. They are public questions; they are public policies; and when we select the men to carry them out we are acting for the people of the United States, and yet we are concealing from the people of the United States what we do and how we do it. It is their Government, and they ought to know. Very often the policy of the Government depends upon who is selected for these important places.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator implied that one reason why the organizations to which he belongs, and others not secret, like the churches, discuss their candidates in committees behind closed doors, is because they are interested in the moral character of the candidates. Does the Senator mean to imply that the Senate, in the discharge of its duty in ratifying nominations sent here by the President, is not interested in the moral qualifications of the nominees?

Mr. NORRIS. No, sir; I do not intend to intimate anything of the kind.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that any man whose name is sent here by the President ought to be so clean and aboveboard that his moral character can be discussed in the open?

Mr. NORRIS. At least under a democratic form of government, for an important office, the President ought not to send the name of anybody here and no man ought to permit his name to come here if he is so immoral that he is afraid of the sunlight of publicity. If he does, and he is shown to be immoral or unfit or disqualified in any way, then, not only as to him but as to the public whom we represent, they ought to know all about him.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. My fear—and it is the basis of my support of the closed session—is founded on the inclination of the general public to listen to any charge against the good moral character of a man, and the ease with which a man's reputation can be blackened. It seems to me we are suffering just now from that tendency.

Mr. NORRIS. There is a great deal in what the Senator says, but in my judgment the secrecy of our sessions will not prevent that. I sympathize with the Senator in that idea. What he mentions often happens in public campaigns, and it is one of the regretable things that good men, able men, refuse to become candidates for public office because of that. That is to be regretted. I know of no way to remedy it. It is one of the things in democratic government that we must contend against, and, after all, we must abide by the result of the ballot box, whatever it may be. It sometimes drives out of public life men who ought to stay in public life for the good of the country and the good of humanity. That is true; but it is said that Benjamin Franklin, speaking about free speech and the free press—and I can not quote him literally, of course—said that if we had free speech and a free press men would abuse it, and then in the next sentence he said, "I admit they will. I know of no way to stop it. They will abuse it. If we undertake to suppress it, we are going to bring on a bigger and a greater evil than the abuse that would take place under a free press and free speech, because it would ultimately happen that somebody would have to decide that this man's speech should be suppressed or that that paper should be suppressed, and ultimately it would mean that tyrants in control would suppress everything," as Mussolini does, and he said that he did not believe in that or agree with it.

Mr. FESS. It would be impossible to suppress free speech and a free press, and we would not agree to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course it would be impossible.

Mr. FESS. But the thing that impresses me is that a charge against the character of a man is always news, and that it is flashed from ocean to ocean, usually in big headlines, and some of the people who read it are willing to believe it; but, on the other hand, when the correction comes, that is not news.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. FESS. And the public will not even pay any attention to it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They do that even with respect to candidates for President of the United States.

Mr. FESS. I know they do.

Mr. NORRIS. They even do that with regard to Senators, not only when they are candidates, but when they are here, quietly and peacefully trying to do their duty.

Mr. FESS. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. We can not help it. I would help it if I could, but I do not know any way out of it.

Mr. FESS. It seems to me that there is a greater freedom to make the investigation if we know that a person into whose character we are inquiring is not going to be attacked before the public unrighteously, although our purpose is entirely honorable. It seems to me we are putting too little value——

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not interrupt further. I wanted to conclude some time ago, but each question always reminds me of something else. I want to say one word with regard to what the Senator from Ohio has said about the affliction that must come to everybody in public life, which is true. There is no escape from it. But, as a matter of practice, all of us know that it is very seldom, when the President sends a man's name here, especially for an important office, that his character is involved.

Mr. West's character was not involved when his name was sent to the Senate. Those who opposed his nomination had no personal animosity against the man. They would have been glad to support him for some other office than the one for which he was nominated, but they felt that a public policy was involved in naming him to head a particular department of our Government of very great importance. That is all that was involved in that. It was a public question, in no sense a private question, with regard to the man's private character or his morals.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska would take care of the situation presented by the Senator from Ohio, and we might have a closed executive session under the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, and whatever is said will be said in secret under that provision. But then the final vote is taken, when the matter is determined, it ought to be given to the public, it ought to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Nothing that has occurred during the debate would be given out, but the bare roll call would be published. I submit to the Senate that no Senator worthy to be in this body should be ashamed or afraid to have his vote made public, to be given out in his own State, and to have it printed in the RECORD.

I can understand that a case might arise when we would prefer to discuss the matter behind closed doors. I can conceive a case where a man's enemies might "frame" him and seek to destroy him without any foundation. Then it would be better to discuss the matter and thrash it out in secret. But when Senators come to vote, after they have made up their minds and have finally decided the case, not deciding for themselves but deciding for this Government, deciding for the people who sent them here, why should not a bare roll call be given to the public?

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRAZIER in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Would it do the Senator much good to be able to tell the people in his State how he voted unless he was able to lay before them the facts on which his vote was based? I think that would make things worse.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not at all, because nearly every appointment of any consequence is discussed by the newspapers before it comes to us, or at least before we take it up for consideration, and usually when the Senate divides on one of these matters it is because of a public policy, as the Senator from Nebraska has suggested; it is because of a man's former position with regard to a certain industry and with regard to his sympathies for the public concerning that industry, where the public interest is on one side and the industry's interest is on the other, and we fear that the center of gravity in the man is on that side of the question instead of being on the side of the public.

A Senator does not have to be able to tell his constitutents why he voted against the man or why he voted for him. He would simply say, "I considered, after hearing all the testimony, that it was right and proper to confirm him, and I am responsible for my vote." That is what I am getting at. Let them hold each Senator accountable. Or let the Senator say, "I voted against the appointee because I believed his former environment had been such that his sympathies would be entirely on the side of certain interests antagonistic to the interest of the public."

Mr. President, the Supreme Court itself does not hold its meetings in the open when it writes its opinions. But the Supreme Court, in the trial of every case, involving the humblest citizen or the proudest in the land, sits in the open. Newspaper men can sit there, as they do. The public can go into the court room to hear a case tried, and it does.

It is all done in the open. When the judges retire to make up their opinions, they confer in secret, but they publish their opinions and give their votes. We know when there is a majority and a minority opinion, and we know how many judges voted for the one opinion and how many voted for the other. There is no secret about it. We know who they are.

What is the situation here, as brought to the attention of the Senator from Nebraska by my colleague [Mr. BLACK]? The man who represents the executive branch of the Government makes his appointment, and then, if he wants to, he comes and sits in this body and watches it, although we are in secret from the public, watches how each Senator votes, and hears what each Senator says, but that same Senator, sitting here representing a sovereign State, is denied the right to tell the people who sent him here how he voted. It is ridiculous, to my mind. It tears at the very vitals of open and free constitutional government. There is no excuse for it.

I am willing, as occasion arises, to have secret executive sessions for the discussion of particular cases. The Senate can judge that from time to time. But I see no reason on earth why, when I get ready to vote, my vote should not be recorded in the open, and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that my people may see how I vote, and that I may have the benefit of having them and everybody else in the country know how I vote.

There is no use trying to cover up the situation that exists here. There was a so-called farcical secret session not long since, and in the next day or two the whole thing was public, was printed in the newspapers, but Senators are still forbidden to tell anybody how they voted. If some one asks a Senator, "Did you vote that way or not?" he says, "I am not at liberty to tell you."

Mr. President, I hope the resolution offered by the Senator from Washington, as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Nebraska, will be adopted.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I say that the situation is even worse than it is pictured by the Senator from Alabama, because this list of votes, bearing every evidence of authenticity, is given to the public, and nobody whose name appears on the list has any opportunity at all to give the reasons why he voted in the way he is reported to have voted.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, as the Senator has suggested, a newspaper comes out and gives a list of names, but a Senator is not at liberty to say what the truth is in the matter. He can not say whether the newspaper article correctly reported his vote. I reserve the right to tell the people of Alabama how I vote. I am not going to be misrepresented by somebody as to how I voted in this Chamber. I do not want to hide my vote. I never have. I want an opportunity to properly make known how I voted. I am not going to deny to the people who send me here the right to know how I vote on every question.

Let us settle this matter now, and if we want to have a closed session we can order it by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I think that the implication which has been made by some of the speakers—that anyone is afraid to have his vote known and therefore votes for a secret session—is unfortunate and uncalled for. At the same time, I do think that when the fathers who preceded us provided for secret sessions they showed a broader knowledge of human nature than some of us are inclined to exhibit to-day.

Human nature has not changed a great deal since the earliest recorded history. The laws which were handed down on the twelve tables are still considered to be worthy of reverence and are necessary in a large part of the world to-day. Human nature has not changed a great deal.

When we come to the discussion of personalities, we are likely to offend, we are likely to be tempted to please. Those of us who are interested in the feelings of others are likely to be a little shy about speaking our minds frankly in public, not because we are afraid that we might be punished by the President of the United States or by any judge or by any Cabinet officer, but because we do not like to offend the feelings of the person whose name has been sent to us.

Once in a while we say things in a small group which we would be perfectly willing to say even if the person talked about were present, but there are very few of us who are willing to discuss our friends in public. It is not considered courteous or proper to discuss the private qualifications of a friend or an acquaintance in a public place. That has been for a long time considered to be an offense against good manners.

I take it that when this rule was adopted it was adopted with a view to protecting persons from being obliged to speak their minds frankly in public when they preferred to give their opinions in private to their colleagues who had the right and the duty to vote on the nomination of the individual, and who desired to learn everything about him, who desired to have him protected by not having everything said in public.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is H. R. 11526, the cruiser bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution which we have been considering may lie on the table without prejudice.

Mr. CURTIS. Under the rule, I understand, it should go to the calendar.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wonder if we could not go on for half an hour with the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I understand the resolution has gone to the calendar. Am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the request to be that the resolution should lie on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; it should go to the calendar.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is correct. It should go to the calendar.

Mr. NORRIS. Request was made for unanimous consent that it go over without prejudice, but I understand objection was made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is correct. The resolution will go to the calendar.

Mr. HEFLIN subsequently said: Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] what he thinks is the status of his resolution and when it will be up for consideration again and be pending before the Senate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the resolution has gone to the calendar and I shall have to get it up the best way I can.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator can move to take it up.

Mr. JONES. I can, and I expect to do so at the first opportunity.

ROCK CREEK AND POTOMAC PARKWAY

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 5339) to enable the Rock Creek and Potomac Park Commission, established by act of March 4, 1913, to make slight changes in the boundaries of said parkway by excluding therefrom and selling certain small areas, and including other limited areas, the net cost not to exceed the total sum already authorized for the entire project and I submit a report (No. 1580) thereon.

I will say that we can save about $100,000 for the Government if we adopt the plan outlined in the bill. It is a Senate bill, and I desire to have it passed so it can go to the House and be acted on there at the present session of Congress. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. If it leads to any discussion I shall not press it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 5339. Is there objection?

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us have the bill read, and then I think we should have an explanation of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. How is the land to be sold?

Mr. SMOOT. By the Parkway Commission.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not think we ought to pass a bill of this kind by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me explain it.

Mr. NORRIS. It will take some time to find out about it, because it must be explained.

Mr. SMOOT. It will take only two or three minutes to explain it.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it had better go to the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will go to the calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a few days ago I introduced the bill (S. 5601) providing for an appropriation for the benefit of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Tribes of Indians of Oklahoma.

Following a rule which obtains in another body with which I am more familiar, I asked that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The bill deals with a wholly local matter and proposes an appropriation from a tribal fund. I understand that in this body a bill of that character should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNITED STATES PROPERTY AT NEW YORK CITY

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

To the Senate:

In compliance with the request contained in Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, I return herewith S. J. Res. 171, entitled "Joint resolution granting the consent of Congress to the city of New York to enter upon certain United States property for the purpose of constructing a rapid-transit railway."

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

The WHITE HOUSE, January 31, 1929.
